PREFACE.

This little volume presents an account of the life of one of the noblest and most versatile artists of Germany, with a passing glance at the activities of Northern Europe at the era of the Reformation. The weird and wonderful paintings of Dürer are herein concisely described, as well as the most famous and characteristic of his engravings and carvings; and his quaint literary works are enumerated. It has also been thought advisable to devote considerable space to details about Nuremberg, the scene of the artist’s greatest labors; and to reproduce numerous extracts from his fascinating Venetian letters and Lowland journals.

The modern theory as to Dürer’s wife and his home has been accepted in this work, after a long and careful examination of the arguments on both sides. It is pleasant thus to be able to aid in the rehabilitation of the much-slandered Agnes, and to have an oppressive cloud of sorrow removed from the memory of the great painter.

The chief authorities used in the preparation of this new memoir are the recent works of Dr. Thausing and Mr. W. B. Scott, with the series of articles now current in "The Portfolio," written by Professor Colvin. Mrs. Heaton's biography has also been studied with care; and other details have been gathered from modern works of travel and art-criticism, as well as from "The Art Journal," "La Gazette des Beaux Arts," and other periodicals of a similar character.

CHAPTER I.

The Activities of Nuremberg.—The Dürer Family.—Early Years of Albert.—His Studies with Wohlgemuth.—The Wander-Jahre.

The free imperial city of Nuremberg, in the heart of Franconia, was one of the chief centres of the active life of the Middle Ages, and shared with Augsburg the great trans-continental traffic between Venice and the Levant and Northern Europe. Its municipal liberties were jealously guarded by venerable guilds and by eminent magistrates drawn from the families of the merchant-princes, forming a government somewhat similar to the Venetian Council. The profits of a commercial prosperity second only to that of the Italian ports had greatly enriched the thrifty burghers, aided by the busy manufacturing establishments which made the city "the Birmingham of the Middle Ages." Public and private munificence exerted itself in the erection and adornment of new and splendid buildings; and the preparation of works of art and utility was stimulated on all sides. It was the era of the discovery of America, the revival of classic learning, and the growth of free thought in matters pertaining to religion. So far had the inventions of the artisans contributed to the comfort of the people, that Pope Pius II. said that "A Nuremberg citizen is better lodged than the King of Scots;" and so widely were they exported to foreign realms, that the proud proverb arose that

"Nuremberg's hand
   Goes through every land."

Nuremberg still stands, a vast mediæval relic, in the midst of the whirl and activity of modern Germany, rich and thriving, but almost unchanged in its antique beauty. The narrow streets in which Dürer walked are flanked, as then, by quaint gable-roofed houses, timber-fronted, with mullioned windows and arching portals. In the faded and venerable palaces of the fifteenth century live the descendants of the old patrician families, cherishing the memories and archives of the past; and the stately Gothic churches are still rich in religious architecture, and in angular old Byzantine pictures and delicate German carvings. On the hill the castle rears its ponderous ramparts, which have stood for immemorial ages; and the high towers along the city walls have not yet bowed their brave crests to the spirit of the century of boulevards and railroads.

With two essentials of civilization, paper and printing-presses, Nuremberg supplied herself at an early day. The first paper-mill in Germany was established here in 1390; and its workmen were obliged to take an oath never to make paper for themselves, nor to reveal the process of manufacture. They went out on a strike when the mill was enlarged, but the authorities imprisoned them until they became docile once more. Koberger’s printing-house contained twenty-four presses, and employed over a hundred men, printing not only Bibles and breviaries, but also chronicles, homilies, poems, and scientific works. As the Aldine Press attracted many authors and scholars to Venice, so Koberger’s teeming press led several German literati to settle at Nuremberg. For the four first years of Dürer's life, the wonderful mathematician and astronomer Regiomontanus dwelt here, and had no less than twenty-one books printed by Koberger. His numerous inventions and instruments awakened the deepest interest in the Nuremberg craftsmen, and stimulated a fruitful spirit of inquiry for many years.

The clockmakers of Nuremberg were famous for their ingenious productions. Watches were invented here in the year 1500, and were long known as "Nuremberg eggs." The modern composition of brass was formed by Erasmus Ebner; wire-drawing machinery also was a Nuremberg device; the air-gun was invented by Hobsinger; the clarionet, by Denner; and the church-organs made here were the best in Germany. There were also many expert metal-workers and braziers; and fifty master-goldsmiths dwelt in the town, making elegant and highly artistic works, images, seals, and medals, which were famous throughout Europe. The most exquisite flowers and insects, and other delicate objects, were reproduced in filagree silver; and the first maiolica works in Northern Europe were also founded here.

Isolated, like the ducal cities of Italy, from the desolating wars of the great powers of Europe, and like them also growing rapidly in wealth and cultivation, Nuremberg afforded a secure refuge for Art and its children. In Dürrer’s day the great churches of St. Sebald, St. Lawrence, and Our Lady were finished; Peter Vischer executed the exquisite and unrivalled bronze Shrine of St. Sebald; and Adam Kraft completed the fairy-like Sacrament-house, sixty feet high, and “delicate as a tree covered with hoar-frost.” Intimate with these two renowned artificers was Linde-nast, “the red smith,” who worked skilfully in beaten copper; and their studies were conducted in company with Vischer’s five sons, who, with their wives and children, all dwelt happily at their father’s house. Vischer lived till a year after Dürrer’s death, but there is no intimation that the two artists ever met. Another eminent craftsman was the unruly Veit Stoss, the marvel-lous wood-carver, many of whose works remain to this day; and there was also Hans Beheim, the sculptor, “an honorable, pious, and God-fearing man;" and Bullman, who "was very learned in astronomy, and was the first to set the Theoria Planetarum in motion by clockwork;" and he who made the great alarm-bell, which was inscribed, "I am called the mass and the fire bell: Hans Glockengeiser cast me: I sound to God's service and honor." What shall we say also of Hartmann, Dürer's pupil, who invented the measuring-rod; Schoner, the maker of terrestrial globes; Donner, who improved screw machinery; and all the skilful gun-makers, joiners, carpet-workers, and silk-embroiderers? There was also the burgher Martin Behaim, the inventor of the terrestrial globe, who anticipated Columbus by sailing Eastward across the Pacific Ocean, passing through the Straits of Magellan and discovering Brazil, as early as 1485.

In Germany, as in Italy, the studio of the artist, full of pure and lofty ideals, had hardly yet evolved itself from the workshop of the picture-manufacturer. Nuremberg's chief artists at this time were Michael Wohlgemuth, Dürer's master; Lucas Kornelisz, also called Ludwig Krug, who, though a most skilful engraver, was sometimes forced to adopt the profession of a cook in order to support himself; and Matthias Zagel, who was expert in both painting and engraving. Still another was the Venetian Jacopo de' Barbari, or Jacob Walch, "the master of the Caduceus," a dexterous engraver and designer, whom Dürer alludes to in his Venetian and Netherland writings. The art of engraving had been invented early in the fifteenth century, and was developing rapidly and richly toward perfection. The day of versatile artists had arrived, when men combined the fine and industrial arts in one life, and devoted themselves to making masterpieces in each department. The northern nations, unaided by classic models and traditions, were developing a new and indigenous æsthetic life, slow of growth, but bound to succeed in the long run.

The literary society of Dürer's epoch at Nuremberg was grouped in the Sodalitas Literaria Rhenana, under the learned Conrad Celtes, who published a book of Latin comedies, pure in Latinity and lax in morals, which he mischievously attributed to the Abbess Roswitha. Pirkheimer and the monk Chelidonius also belonged to this sodality. Other contemporary literati of the city were Cochlaus, Luther's satirical opponent; the Hebraist Osiander; Venatorius, who united the discordant professions of poetry and mathematics; the Provost Pfinzing, for whose poem of Tewrdannkh, Dürer's pupil Schaußelein made 118 illustrations; Baumgartner, Melanchthon's friend; Veit Dietrich, the reformer; and Joachim Camerarius, the Latinist. But the most illustrious of Nuremberg's authors at that time was the cobbler-poet, Hans Sachs, a radical in politics and religion, who scourged the priests and the capitalists of his day in songs and satires which were sung and recited by the workmen of all Germany. He himself tells us that he wrote 4,200 master-songs, 208 comedies and tragedies, 73 devotional and love songs, and 1,007 fables, tales, and miscellaneous poems; and others say that his songs helped the Reformation as much as Luther's preaching.

Thus the activities of mechanics, art, and literature pressed forward with equal fervor in the quaint old Franconian city, while Albert Dürer's life was passing on. "Abroad and far off still mightier things were doing; Copernicus was writing in his observatory, Vasco di Gama was on the Southern Seas."

During the next twenty-four years she bore him eighteen children, seven daughters and eleven sons, of whose births, names, and godparents the father made careful descriptions. Three only, Albert, Andreas, and Hans, arrived at years of maturity. It may well be believed that the poor master-goldsmith was forced to work hard and struggle incessantly to support such a great family; and his portrait shows that the hand-to-mouth existence of so many years had told heavily and left its imprint on his weary and careworn face. Yet he had certain sources of peace and gentleness in his life, and never sank into moroseness or selfishness. Let us quote the tender and reverent words of his son: “My father’s life was passed in great struggles and in continuous hard work. With my dear mother bearing so many children, he never could become rich, as he had nothing but what his hands brought him. He had thus many troubles, trials, and adverse circumstances. But yet from every one who knew him he received praise, because he led an honorable Christian life, and was patient, giving all men consideration, and thanking God. He indulged himself in few pleasures, spoke little, shunned society, and was in truth a God-fearing man. My dear father took great pains with his children, bringing them up to the honor of God. He made us know what was agreeable to others as well as to our Maker, so that we might become good neighbors; and every day he talked to us of these things, the love of God and the conduct of life."

Albert Dürer was the third child of Albert the Elder and Barbara Hallerin, and was born on the morning of the 21st of May, 1471. The house in which the Dürers then lived was a part of the great pile of buildings owned and in part occupied by the wealthy Pirkheimer family, and was called the Pirkheimer Hinterhaus. It fronted on the Winkler Strasse of Nuremberg, and was an ambitious home for a craftsman like Albert. The presence of Antonius Koberger, the famous book-printer, as godfather to the new-born child, shows also that the Dürers occupied an honorable position in the city.

The Pirkheimers were then prominent among the patrician families of Southern Germany, renowned for antiquity, enormously wealthy through successful commerce, and honored by important offices in the State. The infant Willibald Pirkheimer was of about the same age as the young Albert Durer; and the two became close companions in all their childish sports, despite the difference in the rank of their families. When the goldsmith's family moved to another house, at the foot of the castle-hill, five years later, the warm intimacy between the children continued unchanged.

The instruction of Albert in the rudiments of learning was begun at an early age, probably in the parochial school of St. Sebald, and was conducted after the singular manner of the schools of that day, when printed books were too costly to be intrusted to children. He lived comfortably in his father's house, and daily received the wise admonitions and moral teachings of the elder Albert. His friendship for Willibald enabled him to learn certain elements of the higher studies into which the young patrician was led by his tutors; and his visits to the Pirkheimer mansion opened views of higher culture and more refined modes of life.

Albert was enamoured with art from his earliest years, and spent many of his leisure hours in making sketches and rude drawings, which he gave to his schoolmates and friends. The Imhoff Collection had a drawing of three heads, done in his eleventh year; the Posonyi Collection claimed to possess a Madonna of his fifteenth year—and the British Museum has a chalk-drawing of a woman holding a bird in her hand, whose first owner wrote on it, "This was drawn for me by Albert Dürer before he became a painter." The most interesting of these early works is in the Albertina at Vienna, and bears the inscription: "This I have drawn from myself from the looking-glass, in the year 1484, when I was still a child.—ALBERT DURER." It shows a handsome and pensive boy-face, oval in shape, with large and tender eyes, filled with solemnity and vague melancholy; long hair cut straight across the forehead, and falling over the shoulders; and full and pouting lips. It is faulty in design, but shows a considerable knowledge of drawing, and a strong faculty for portraiture. The certain sadness of expression tells that the schoolboy had already become acquainted with grief, probably from the straitened circumstances of his family, and the melancholy deaths of so many brothers and sisters. The great mystery of sorrow was full early thrown across the path of the solemn artist. This portrait was always retained by Dürer as a memorial of his childhood.

He says of his father, "For me, I think, he had a particular affection; and, as he saw me diligent in learning, he sent me to school. When I had learned to write and read, he took me home again, with the intention of teaching me the goldsmith's work. In this I began to do tolerably well." He was taken into the goldsmith's workshop in his thirteenth year, and remained there two years, receiving instruction which was not without value in his future life, in showing him the elements of the arts of modelling and design. The accuracy and delicacy of his later plastic works show how well he apprehended these ideas, and how far he acquired sureness of expression. The elder Albert was a skilful master-workman, highly esteemed in his profession, and had received several important commissions. It is said that the young apprentice executed under his care a beautiful piece of silver-work representing the Seven Agonies of Christ.
“But my love was towards painting, much more than towards the goldsmith’s craft. When at last I told my father of my inclination, he was not well pleased, thinking of the time I had been under him as lost if I turned painter. But he left me to have my will; and in the year 1486, on St. Andrew’s Day, he settled me apprentice with Michael Wohlgemuth, to serve him for three years. In that time God gave me diligence to learn well, in spite of the pains I had to suffer from the other young men.” Thus Dürer describes his change in life, and the embarkation on his true vocation, as well as the reluctance of the elder Albert to allow his noble and beloved boy to pass out from his desolated household into other scenes, and away from his companionship.

Wohlgemuth was one of the early religious painters who stood at the transition-point between the school of Cologne and that of the Van Eycks, or between the old pietistic traditions of Byzantine art and the new ideas of the art of the Northern Reformation. The conventionalisms of the Rhenish and Franconian paintings were being exchanged for a fresher originality and a truer realism; and the pictures of this time curiously blended the old and the new. Wohlgemuth seems to have considered art as a money-getting trade rather than a high vocation, and his workroom was more a shop than a studio. He turned out countless Madonnas and other religious subjects for churches and chance purchasers, and also painted chests and carved and colored images of the saints, many of which were executed by his apprentices. A few of his works, however, were done with great care and delicacy, and show a worthy degree of sweetness and simplicity. Evidently the young pupil gained little besides a technical knowledge of painting from this master,—the mechanical processes, the modes of mixing and applying colors, the chemistry of pigments, and a certain facility in using them. It was well that the influences about him were not powerful enough to warp his pure and original genius into servile imitations of decadent methods. His hands were taught dexterity; and his mind was left to pursue its own lofty course, and use them as its skilful allies in the new conquests of art.

Wood-engraving was also carried on in Wohlgemuth's studio, and it is probable that Dürer here powerful effect on the youth. Schongauer was the greatest artist and engraver that Germany had as yet produced, and exerted a profound influence on the art of the Rhineland. He renewed the fantastic conceits and grotesque vagaries which the Papal artists of Cologne had suppressed as heathenish, and prepared the way for, or perhaps even suggested, the weird elements of Dürer's conceptions. At the same time he passed back of his Netherland art-education, and studied a mystic benignity and dreamy spirituality suggestive of the Umbrian painters, with whose chief, the great Perugino, Martin was acquainted. Herein Dürer's works were in strong contrast with Schongauer's, and showed the new spirit that was stirring in the world.

Next to Schongauer, the great Italian artist Mantegna exercised the strongest influence upon Dürer, who studied his bold and austere engravings with earnest admiration, showing his traits in many subsequent works. Probably he met the famous Mantuan painter during the Wander-jahre, in Italy; and at the close of his Venetian journey he was about to pay a visit of homage to him, when he heard of his death.
During his three years of study we have seen that the delicate and sensitive youth suffered much from the reckless rudeness and jeering insults of his companions, rough hand-workers who doubtless failed to understand the poignancy of the torments which they inflicted on the sad-eyed son of genius. But his home was near at hand, and the tender care of his parents, always beloved. How often he must have wandered through the familiar streets of Nuremberg, with his dreamy artist-face and flowing hair, and studied the Gothic palaces, the fountains adorned with statuary, and the rich treasures of art in the great churches! Beyond the tall-towered town, danger lurked on every road; but inside the gray walls was peace and safety, and no free lances nor marauding men-at-arms could check the aspiring flight of the youth's bright imagination.

"And when the three years were out, my father sent me away. I remained abroad four years, when he recalled me; and, as I had left just after Easter in 1490, I returned home in 1494 just after Whitsuntide." Thus Albert describes the close of his Lehr-jahre, or labor-years, and the entrance upon his Wander-jahre, or travel-years. According to a German custom, still prevalent in a modified degree, the youth was obliged to travel for a long period, and study and practise his trade or profession in other cities, before settling for life as a master-workman. Unfortunately all that Dürer records as to these eventful four years is given in the sentences above; and we can only theorize as to the places which he visited, and his studies of the older art-treasures of Europe. Some authors believe that a part of the Wander-jahre was spent in Italy, and Dr. Thausing, Dürer's latest and best biographer, clearly proves this theory by a close study of his notes and sketches. Others claim with equal positiveness, and less capability of proof, that they were devoted to the Low Countries. It is certain that he abode at Colmar in 1492, where he was honorably received by Gaspar, Paul, and Louis, the three brothers of Martin Schongauer. The great Martin had died some years before; but many of his best paintings were preserved at Colmar, and were carefully studied by Dürer. At a later day he wandered through the Rhineland to Basle, and spent his last year at Strasbourg. His portraits of his master and mistress in the latter city were dated in 1494, and pertained to the Imhoff Collection.

His portrait painted by himself in 1493 was procured at Rome by the Hofrath Beireis, and described by Goethe. It shows a bright and vigorous face, full of youthful earnestness and joy, rich, harmonious, and finely executed, though thinly colored. He is attired in a blue-gray cloak with yellow strings, an embroidered shirt whose sleeves are bound with peach-colored ribbons, and a purple cap; and holds a piece of the blue flower called Manns-treue, or Man's-faith.
CHAPTER II.

Dürer marries Agnes Frey.— Her Character.— Early Engravings.— Portraits.— "The Apocalypse."— Death of Dürer's Father. — Drawings.

"And when my Wander-jahre was over, Hans Frey treated with my father, and gave me his daughter, by name the Jungfrau Agnes, with a dowry of 200 guldens. Our wedding was held on the Monday before St. Margaret's Day (in July), in the year 1494." This dry statement of the most important event of the artist's life illustrates the ancient German custom of betrothal, where the bond of wedlock was considered as a matter-of-fact copartnership, with inalienable rights and duties, devoid of sentiment or romance. Since the relatives of the contracting parties were closely affected by such transactions, they usually managed the negotiations themselves; and the young people, thus thrown by their parents at each other's heads, were expected to, and usually did, accept the situation with submissiveness and prudent obedience. In this case it appears that the first overtures came from the family of the lady; and perhaps the order for Albert to return from his wanderings was issued for this reason. Hans Frey was a burgher with large possessions in Nuremberg and the adjacent country; and his daughter was a very beautiful maiden. Her future husband does not appear to have seen her until the betrothal was made.

Most of Dürer's biographers have dwelt at great length on the malign influence which Agnes exercised upon his life, representing her as a jealous virago, imbittering the existence of the noble artist. But Dr. Thausing, in his new and exhaustive history of Dürer's life, vindicates the lady from this evil charge; and his position is carefully reviewed and sustained by Eugéne Müntz. He points out the fact that the long story of Agnes's uncongeniality rests solely on Pirkheimer's letter, and then shows that that ponderous burgher had reasons for personal hostility to her. The unbroken silence which Dürer preserves as to home-troubles, throughout his numerous letters and journals, is held as proof against the charges; and none of his intimate friends and contemporaries (save Pirkheimer) allude to his domestic trials, though they wrote so much about him. The accusation of avarice on her part is combated by several facts, among which is the cardinal one of her self-sacrificing generosity to the Dürrer family after her husband’s death, and the remarkable record of her transferring to the endowment of the Protestant University of Wittenberg the thousand florins which Albert had placed in the hands of the Rath for her support. Pirkheimer’s acrimonious letter (see p. 142) gives her credit at least for virtue and piety; and perhaps we may regard her aversion to the doughty writer as a point in her favor.

It is a singular and unexplained fact, that although Dürrer was accustomed to sketch every one about him, yet no portrait of his wife is certainly known to exist, though several of his sketches are so called, without any foundation or proof. What adds to the strangeness of this omission is the fact that all accounts represent Agnes Dürrer as a very handsome woman.

Probably the newly married couple dwelt at the house of the elder Dürrer during the first years of their union. In 1494 Albert was admitted to depicts the long-bearded saint expiating his guilt in seducing and slaying the princess by crawling about on all-fours like a beast. She is seen at the mouth of a rocky cave, nursing her child. "The Prodigal Son" is another tender and exquisitely finished copper-plate engraving, in which the yearning and prayerful Prodigal, bearing the face of Dürrer, is kneeling on bare knees by the trough at which a drove of swine are feeding. In the background is a group of substantial German farm-buildings, with unconcerned domestic animals and fowls. "The Rape of Amymone" shows a gloomy Triton carrying off a very ugly woman from the midst of her bathing Danaide sisters. "The Dream" portrays an obese German soundly sleeping by a great stove, with a foolish-faced naked Venus and a winged Cupid standing by his side, and a little demon blowing in his ear. "The Love Offer" is made by an ugly old man to a pretty maiden, whose waist is encircled by his arm, while her hand is greedily outstretched to receive the money which he offers. Another early engraving on copper shows a wild and naked man holding an unspeakably ugly woman, who is endeavoring to tear herself from his arms. Still Others delineate Justice sitting on a lion, "The Little Fortune" standing naked on a globe, and the monstrous hog of Franconia.

It was chiefly through his engravings that Dürer became and remains known to the world; and by the same mode of expression he boldly showed forth the doubts and despairs, yearnings and conflicts, not only of his own pure and sorrowful soul, but also of Europe, quivering in the throes of the Reformation.

The artists of Italy, when the age of faith was ended, turned to the empty splendors and symmetries of paganism; but their German brothers faced the new problems more sternly, and strove for the life of the future. Under Dürer's hard and homely German scenes, there seem to be double meanings and unfathomable fancies, usually alluding to sorrow, sin, and death, and showing forth the vanity of all things earthly. In sharp contrast with these profound allegories are the humorous grotesqueness and luxuriant fancifulness which appear in others of the artist's engravings. fantastic, uncouth, and quaint. He frequently yielded to the temptation to introduce strange animals and unearthly monsters into his pictures, even those of the most sacred subjects; and his so-called "Virgin with the Animals" is surrounded by scores of birds, insects, and quadrupeds of various kinds.

It is interesting to hear of the rarity of the early impressions of Durer’s engravings, and the avidity with which they are sought and the keenness with which they are analyzed by collectors. In many cases the copies of these engravings are as good as the originals, and can be distinguished only by the most trifling peculiarities. The water-marks of the paper on which they are printed form a certain indication of their period. Before his Venetian journey Dürer used paper bearing the water-mark of the bull’s head; and, after his return from the Netherlands, paper bearing a little pitcher; while the middle period had several peculiar symbols. A fine impression of the copper-plate engraving of "St. Jerome" recently brought over $500; and the Passion in Copper sold in 1864 for $300.

"The Portfolio" for 1877 contains a long series of articles by Prof. Sidney Colvin on "Albert Dürer: His Teachers, his Rivals, and his Scholars," treating exhaustively of his relations as an engraver to other contemporary masters,—Schongauer, Israehel van Meckenen, Mantegna, Boldini and the Florentines, Jacopo de’ Barbari (Jacob Walch), Marc Antonio, Lucas van Leyden, and certain other excellent but nameless artists.

Vasari says, “The power and boldness of Albert increasing with time, and as he perceived his works to obtain increasing estimation, he now executed engravings on copper, which amazed all who beheld them.” Three centuries later Von Schlegel wrote, “When I turn to look at the numberless sketches and copper-plate designs of the present day, Dürer appears to me like the originator of a new and noble system of thought, burning with the zeal of a first pure inspiration, and eager to diffuse his deeply conceived and probably true and great ideas.”

In 1497 Dürer painted the excellent portrait of his father, which the Rath of Nuremberg presented to Charles I. of England, and which is now at Sion House, the seat of the Earl of Northumberland. It shows a man aged yet strong, with grave and anxious eyes, compressed lips, and an earnest expression. Another similar portrait of the same date is in the Munich Pinakothek. He also executed two portraits of the pretty patrician damsel, Catherine Fürleger; one as a loose-haired Magdalenen (which is now in London), and the other as a German lady (now at Frankfort).

In 1498 Dürer painted a handsome portrait of himself, with curly hair and beard, and a rich holiday costume. His expression is that of a man who appreciates and delights in his own value, and is thoroughly self-complacent. This picture was presented by Nuremberg to King Charles I. of England; and, in the dispersion of his gallery during the Commonwealth, it was bought by the Grand Duke of Tuscany. It is now in the Uffizi Gallery, though Mündler calls this Florentine picture a copy of a nobler original which is in the Madrid Gallery.

During this year Dürer published his first great series of woodcuts, representing the Apocalypse of St. John, in fifteen pictures full of terrible impressiveness and the naturalistic quaintness of early German faith. The boldness of the youth who thus took for his theme the marvellous mysteries of Patmos was warranted in the grand weirdness and perennial fascination of the resulting compositions. This series of rich and skilful engravings marked a new era in the history of wood-engraving, and the entrance of a noble artistic spirit into a realm which had previously been occupied by rude monkish cuts of saints and miracles. Jackson calls these representations of the Apocalypse "much superior to all wood-engravings that had previously appeared, both in design and execution." The series was brought out simultaneously in German and Latin editions, and was published by the author himself. It met with a great success, and was soon duplicated in new pirated editions.

It has of late years become a contested point as to whether Dürer really engraved his wood-cuts with his own hands, or whether he only drew the designs on the wood, and left their mechanical execution to practical workmen. It is only within the present century that a theory to the latter effect has been advanced and supported by powerful arguments and first-class authorities. The German scholars Bartsch and Von Eye, and the historians of engraving Jackson and Chatto, concur in denying Dürer's use of the graver. But there is a strong and well-supported belief that many of the engravings attributed to him were actually done by his hand, and that during the earlier part of his career he was largely engaged in this way. The exquisite wood-carvings which are undoubtedly his work show that he was not devoid of the manual dexterity needful for these plates; and it is also certain that the mediæval artists did not hold themselves above mechanical labors, since even Raphael and Titian were among the peintres-graveurs. Dürer's efforts greatly elevated the art of wood-engraving in Germany, and this improvement was directly conducive to its growth in popularity. A large number of skilful engravers were developed by the new demand; and in his later years Dürer doubtless found enough expert assistants, and was enabled to devote his time to more noble achievements. He used the art to multiply and disseminate his rich ideas, which thus found a more ready expression than that of painting. Heller attributes one hundred and seventy-four wood-engravings to him; and many more, of varying claims to authenticity, are enumerated by other writers. Twenty-six were made before 1506. The finest and the only perfect collection of Dürer's woodcuts is owned by Herr Cornill d'Orville of Frankfort-on-the-Main.

the next twenty years the harassed artist often sought refuge among these gatherings of choice spirits, when weary of his continuous labors of ambition.

Dürer pathetically narrates the death of his venerable father, in words as vivid as one of his pictures, and full of quaint tenderness: "Soon he clearly saw death before him, and with great patience waited to go, recommending my mother to me, and a godly life to all of us. He received the sacraments, and died a true Christian, on the eve of St. Matthew (Sept. 21), at midnight, in 1502. . . . The old nurse helped him to rise, and put the close cap upon his head again, which had become wet by the heavy sweat. He wanted something to drink; and she gave him Rhine wine, of which he tasted some, and then wished to lie down again. He thanked her for her aid, but no sooner lay back upon his pillows than his last agony began. Then the old woman trimmed the lamp, and set herself to read aloud St. Bernard's dying song; but she only reached the third verse, and behold his soul had gone. God be good to him! Amen. Then the little maid, when she saw that he was dying, ran quickly up to my chamber, and waked me. I went down fast, but he was gone; and I grieved much that I had not been found worthy to be beside him at his end."

At this time Albert took home his brother Hans, who was then twelve years old, to learn the art of painting in his studio; and his other young brother, Andreas, the goldsmith's apprentice, now set forth upon his Wander-jahre. Within two years his mother, the widowed Barbara, had exhausted her scanty means; and she also was taken into Dürer's home, and lovingly cared for by her son.

In 1503 Dürer's frail constitution yielded to an attack of illness. A drawing of Christ crowned with thorns, now in the British Museum, bears his inscription: "I drew this face in my sickness, 1503." In the same year he executed a copper-plate engraving of a skull emblazoned on an escutcheon, which is crowned by a winged helmet, and supported by a weird woman, over whose shoulder a satyr's face is peering. A contemporary copper-plate shows the Virgin nursing the Infant Jesus. The painting of this same subject, bearing the date of 1503, is now in the Vienna Belvedere, portraying an unlovely German mother and a very earthly baby.

The celebrated "Green Passion" was executed in 1504, and is a series of twelve drawings on green paper, illustrating the sufferings of Christ. Some critics prefer this set, for delicacy and power, to either of the three engraved Passions. The theory is advanced that these exquisite drawings were made for the Emperor, or some other magnate, who wished to possess a unique copy. The Green Passion is now in the Vienna Albertina, the great collection of drawings made by the Archduke Albert of Sachsen-Teschen, which includes 160 of Dürer's sketches, designs, travel-notes, studies of costume and architecture, &c.

Over 600 authentic sketches and drawings by Dürer are now preserved in Europe, and are of great interest as showing the freedom and firmness of the great master's first conceptions, and the gradual evolution of his ultimate ideas. They are drawn on papers of various colors and different preparations, with pen, pencil, crayon, charcoal, silver point, tempera, or water-colors. Some are highly finished, and others are only rapid jottings or bare outlines. The richest of the ancient collections was that of Hans Imhoff of Nuremberg, who married Pirkheimer's daughter Felicitas, and in due time added his father-in-law's Dürer-drawings to his own collection. His son Willibald further enriched the family art-treasures by many of the master's drawings which he bought from Andreas Dürer, and by inheriting the pictures of Barbara Pirkheimer. He solemnly enjoined in his will that this great collection should never be alienated, but should descend through the Imhoff family as an honored possession. His widow, however, speedily offered to sell the entire series to the Emperor Rudolph, and it was soon broken up and dispersed. The Earl of Arundel secured a great number of Dürer's drawings here, and carried them to England. In 1637 Arundel bought a large folio containing nearly 200 of these sketches, which was bequeathed to the British Museum in 1753 by Sir Hans Sloane. The museum has now one of the best existing collections of these works, some of which are of rare interest and value, especially the highly finished water-colors and pen-drawings.
The interesting sketch-books used by Dürer on his journeys to Venice and to the Netherlands remained forgotten in the archives of a noble Nuremberg family until within less than a century, when the family became extinct, and its property was dispersed. They were then acquired by the venerable antiquary Baron von Derschau, who sold them to Nagler and Heller. Nagler's share was afterwards acquired by the Berlin Museum; and Heller's was bequeathed to the library of Bamberg.

In 1504 Pirkheimer's wife Crescentia died in childbirth, after only two years of married life. Her husband bore witness that she had never caused him any trouble, except by her death; and engaged Dürer to make a picture of her death-bed. This work was beautifully executed in water-colors, and depicts the expiring woman on a great bedstead, surrounded by many persons, among whom are Pirkheimer and his sister Charitas, the Abbess, with the Augustinian Prior.

The exquisite copper-plate engraving of "The Nativity" dates from this year, and shows the Virgin adoring the new-born Jesus, in the shelter of a humble German house among massive ancient ruins, while Joseph is drawing water from the well, and an old shepherd approaches the Child on his knees. The “Adam and Eve” was also done on copper this year, with the parents of all mankind, surrounded by animals, and standing near the tree of knowledge, from which the serpent is delivering the fatal apple to Eve.

In the same year Dürer painted a carefully wrought “Adoration of the Kings,” for the Elector Frederick the Wise of Saxony. It was afterwards presented by Christian II. to the Emperor Rudolph, and is now in the Uffizi, at Florence, which contains more pictures by Dürer than any other gallery outside of Germany. Here also is the controverted picture of “Calvary,” dated 1505, displaying on one small canvas all the scenes of the Passion, with an astonishing number of figures finished in miniature.

“The Satyr’s Family” is an engraving on copper, showing the goat-footed father cheerily playing on a pipe, to the evident amusement of his human wife and child. “The Great Horse” and “The Little Horse” are similar productions of this period, in which the commentators vainly strive to find some recondite meaning. Sixteen engravings on copper were made between 1500 and 1506.

Dürer has been called “The Chaucer of Painting,” by reason of the marvellous quaintness of his conceptions; and Ruskin speaks of him as “intense in trifles, gloomily minute.” His details, minute as they were, received the most careful study, and were all thought out before the pictures were begun, so that he neither erased nor altered his lines, nor made preliminary sketches. He was essentially a thinker who drew, rather than a drawer who thought.

Venice, the master was cordially received, and highly honored by the chief artists and literati of the city. The heads of Venetian art at that time were Giovanni Bellini and Carpaccio, both of whom were advanced in years; and Giorgione and Titian, who were not mentioned by our traveller, though they were both at work for the Fondaco de' Tedeschi at the same time as himself.

During his residence in Venice he wrote nine long letters to "the honorable and wise Herr Willibald Pirkheimer, Burgher of Nuremberg," which were walled up in the Imhoff mansion during the Thirty Years' War, and discovered at a later age. Much of these letters is taken up with details about Pirkheimer's commissions for precious stones and books, or with badinage about the burgher's private life, with frequent allusions to the support of the Durers at home. Of greater interest are the accounts of the writer's successes in art, and the friends whom he met in Venetian society. The letters were embellished with rude caricatures and grotesques, matching the broad humor of the jovial allusions in the text. Either Pirkheimer was a man of most riotous life, or Dürer was a bold and per-tinacious jester, unwearying in mock-earnest re-proofs. These letters were sealed with the Dürer crest, composed of a pair of open doors above three steps on a shield, which was a punning allusion to the name Dürer, or Thürer, Thur being the German word for door. In the second letter he says, —

"I wish you were in Venice. There are many fine fellows among the painters, who get more and more friendly with me; it holds one’s heart
up. Well-brought-up folks, good lute-players, skilled pipers, and many noble and excellent people, are in the company, all wishing me very well, and being very friendly. On the other hand, here are the falsest, most lying, thievish villains in the whole world, appearing to the unwary the pleasantest possible fellows. I laugh to myself when they try it with me: the fact is, they know their rascality is public, though one says nothing. I have many good friends among the Italians, who warn me not to eat or drink with their painters; for many of them are my enemies, and copy my picture in the church, and others of mine wherever they meet with them;
and yet, notwithstanding this, they abuse my works, and say that they are not according to ancient art, and therefore not good. But Gian Bellini has praised me highly before several gentlemen, and he wishes to have something of my painting. He came himself, and asked me to do something for him, saying that he would pay me well for it; and all the people here tell me what a good man he is, so that I also am greatly inclined to him.”

These sentences show the artist’s pleasure at the kindly way in which the Italians received him, and also reveal the danger in which he stood of being poisoned by jealous rivals. Another ambiguous sentence has given rise to the belief that Dürrer had visited Venice eleven years previously, during his Wander-jahre.

Camerarius says that Bellini was so amazed and delighted at the exquisite fineness of Dürrer’s painting, especially of hair, that he begged him to give him the brush with which he had done such delicate work. The Nuremberger offered him any or all of his brushes, but Bellini asked again for the one with which he had painted the hair; upon which Dürrer took one of his common brushes, and painted a long tress of woman’s hair. Bellini reported that he would not have believed such marvellous work possible, if he had not seen it himself.

The third letter describes the adventures of the inexpert artist in securing certain sapphires, amethysts, and emeralds for his “dear Herr Pirkheimer,” and complains that the money earned by painting was all swallowed up by living expenses. The jealous Venetian painters had also forced him, by process of law, to pay money to their art-schools.

His brother Hans was now sixteen years old, and had become a source of responsibility, for Dürer adds: “With regard to my brother, tell my mother to speak to Wohlgemuth, and see whether he wants him, or will give him work till I return, or to others, so that he may help himself. I would willingly have brought him with me to Venice, which would have been useful to him and to me, and also on account of his learning the language; but my mother was afraid that the heavens would fall upon him and upon me too. I pray you, have an eye to him yourself: he is lost with the women-folk. Speak to the boy as you well know how to do, and bid him behave well and learn diligently until I return, and not be a burden to the mother; for I cannot do everything, although I will do my best."

In the fourth letter he speaks of having traded his pictures for jewels, and sends greetings to his friend Baumgartner, saying also: "Know that by the grace of God I am well, and that I am working diligently. . . . I wish that it suited you to be here. I know you would find the time pass quickly, for there are many agreeable people here, very good amateurs; and I have sometimes such a press of strangers to visit me, that I am obliged to hide myself; and all the gentlemen wish me well, but very few of the painters."

The fifth letter opens with a long complimentary flourish in a barbarous mixture of Italian and Spanish, and then chaffs Pirkheimer unmercifully for his increasing intrigues. It also thanks Pirkheimer for trying to placate Agnes Frey, who is evidently much disappointed because her husband lingers so long at Venice. The Prior Eucharius is besought to pray that Dürer might be delivered from the new and terrible "French disease," then fatally prevalent in Italy. Mention is made of Andreas, the goldsmith, Dürer’s brother meeting him at Venice, and borrowing money to relieve his distress.

The next letter starts off with quaint mock-deference, and alludes to the splendid Venetian soldiery, and their contempt of the Emperor. Farther on are unintelligible allusions, and passages too vulgar for translation. He says that the Doge and Patriarch had visited his studio to inspect the new picture, and that he had effectually silenced the artists who claimed that he was only good at engraving, and could not use colors. Soon afterwards he writes about the completion of his great painting of the Rose Garlands; and says, “There is no better picture of the Virgin Mary in the land, because all the artists praise it, as well as the nobility. They say they have never seen a more sublime, a more charming painting.” He adds that he had declined orders to the amount of over 2,000 ducats, in order to return home, and was then engaged in finishing a few portraits.

The last letter congratulates Pirkheimer on his political successes, but expresses a fear lest “so great a man will never go about the streets again talking with the poor painter Dürer,—with a poltroon of a painter.” In response to Pirkheimer’s threat of making love to his wife if he remained away longer, he said that if such was done, he might keep Agnes until her death. He also tells how he had been attending a dancing-school, but could not learn the art, and retired in disgust after two lessons.

The picture which Dürer painted for the Fondaco de’ Tedeschi was until recently supposed to be a “St. Bartholomew;” but it is now believed that it was the renowned “Feast of Rose Garlands,” which is now at the Bohemian Monastery of Strahow. He worked hard on this picture for seven months, and was proud of its beauty and popularity. The Emperor Rudolph II. bought it from the church in which it was set up, and had it carried on men’s shoulders all the way from Venice to Prague, to avoid the dangers attending other modes of conveyance. When Joseph II. sold his pictures, in 1782, this one was bought by the Abbey of Strahow, and remained buried in oblivion for three-quarters of a century. The picture shows the Virgin sitting under a canopy and a star-strewn crown held by

A year later Raphael also came to Bologna, and saw some works left there by Durer, from which arose an intimate correspondence and exchanges of pictures between the artists. The master had been invited to visit the venerable Mantegna, at Mantua; but that Nestor of North-Italian art died before the plan was carried out. Durer afterwards told Camerarius that this death "caused him more grief than any mischance that had befallen him during his life."

Art-critics agree in rejoicing that Dürer conquered the temptations which were held out to him from the gorgeous Italian city, and returned to his plain life in the cold North. He escaped the danger of sacrificing his individualism to the glowing and sensuous Venetian school of art, and preserved the quaintness and vigor of his own Gothic inspirations for the joy of future ages.

The marine backgrounds in many of Dürer's later pictures are referred by Ruskin to the artist's pleasant memories of Venice, "where he received the rarest of all rewards granted to a good workman; and, for once in his life, was understood." Other and wilder landscapes in his woodcuts were reminiscences of the pastoral regions of the Franconian Switzerland.
The personal history of Dürer between 1507 and 1520 was barren of details, but evidently full of earnest work, as existing pictures bear witness. It was the golden period of his art-life, abounding in productiveness. His work-shop was the seat of the chief art-school in Nuremberg, and contained many excellent young painters and engravers, to whom the master delivered his wise axioms and earnest thoughts in rich profusion.

During this period, also, he probably executed certain of his best works in carving, which are hereinafter described. Dr. Thausing denies that Dürer used the chisel of the sculptor to any extent, and refuses to accept the genuineness of the carvings which the earlier biographers have attributed to him. Scott is of the opinion that in most cases these rich and delicate works were executed by other persons, either from his drawings or under his inspection.

On his return from Venice, Dürer painted life-sized nude figures of Adam and Eve, representing them with the fatal apple in their hands, at the moment of the Fall. They are well designed in outline, but possess a certain anatomical hardness, lacking in grace and mobility. They were greatly admired by the Nurembergers, in whose Rath-haus they were placed; but were at length presented to the Emperor Rudolph II. He replaced them with copies, which Napoleon, in 1796, supposed to be Dürer's original works, and removed to Paris. He afterwards presented them to the town of Mayence, where they are still exhibited as Dürer's. The true originals passed into Spain, where they were first redeemed from oblivion by Passavant, about the year 1853. A copy of the Adam and Eve, which was executed in Dürer's studio and under his care, is now at the Pitti Palace.

In the spring of 1507 Dürer met at the house of his brother-in-law Jacob Frey, the rich Frankfort merchant Jacob Heller, who commissioned him to paint an altar-piece. He was delayed by a prolonged attack of fever in the summer, and by the closing works on the Elector's picture.

Between 1507 and 1514 (inclusive) Dürer made forty-eight engravings and etchings, and over a hundred woodcuts, bespeaking an iron diligence and a remarkable power of application. The rapid sale of these works in frequent new editions gave a large income to their author, and placed him in a comfortable position among the burghers of Nuremberg. The religious excitement then prevailing throughout Europe, on the eve of the Reformation, increased the demand for his engravings of the Virgin, the saints, and the great Passion series.

In 1508 Dürer finished the painting of "The Martyrdom of the Ten Thousand Christians," to which he professed to have given all his time for a year. It was ordered by Frederick of Saxony, the patron of Lucas Cranach, who had seen the master's woodcut of the same subject, and desired it reproduced in an oil-painting. It is a painful and unpleasant scene, full of brutality and horror; and the picture is devoid of unity, though conspicuous for clear and brilliant coloring. Dürer and Pirkheimer stand in the middle of the foreground.

On the completion of this work the master wrote to Heller, "No one shall persuade me to work according to what I am paid." He then began Heller's altar-piece, under unnecessary exhortation "to paint his picture well," and made a great number of careful studies for the new composition. When fairly under way, he demanded 200 florins for his work instead of the 130 florins of the contract-price, which drew an angry answer from the frugal merchant, with accusations of dishonesty. The artist rejoined sharply, dwelling upon the great cost of the colors and the length of the task, yet offering to carry out his contract in order to save his good faith. Throughout the next year Heller stimulated the painter to hasten his work, until Dürer became angry, and threw up the commission. He was soon induced to resume it, and completed the picture in the summer of 1509, upon which the delighted merchant paid him gladly, and sent handsome presents to his wife and brother. Dürer wrote to Heller, "It will last fresh and clean for five hundred years, for it is not done as ordinary paintings are. . . . But no one shall ever again persuade me to undertake a painting with so much work in it. Herr Jorg Tauss offered himself to pay me 400 florins for a Virgin in a landscape, but I declined positively, for I should become a beggar by this means. Henceforward I will stick to my engraving; and, if I had done so before, I should be richer by a thousand florins than I am to-day."
The picture which caused so much argument and toil was "The Coronation of the Virgin," which was set up over the bronze monument of the Heller family in the Dominican Church at Frankfort. Its exquisite delicacy of execution attracted great crowds to the church, and quickly enriched the monastery. Singularly enough, the most famous part of the picture was the sole of the foot of one of the kneeling Apostles, which was esteemed such a marvellous work that great sums were offered to have it cut out of the canvas. The Emperor Rudolph II. offered the immense amount of 10,000 florins for the painting, in vain; but in 1613 it passed into the possession of Maximilian of Bavaria, and was destroyed in the burning of the palace at Munich, sixty years later. So the renowned picture, which Dürer said gave him "more joy and satisfaction than any other he ever undertook," passed away, leaving no engraving or other memorial, save a copy by Paul Juvenal. This excellent reproduction is now at Nuremberg, and is provided with the original wings, beautifully painted by Dürer, showing on one the portrait of Jacob Heller and the death of St. James, and on the other Heller's wife, and the martyrdom of St. Catherine.
In 1501 the burgher Schiltkrot and the prous copper-smith Matthaus Landauer founded the House of the Twelve Brothers, an alms-house for poor old men of Nuremberg; and eight years later, Landauer ordered Dürer to paint an altar-piece of "The Adoration of the Trinity," for its chapel. Much of the master's time for the next two years was devoted to this great work.

erty, and contains the gallery of the Dürer Art-Union. In 1828, on the third centenrial of his death, the people erected a bronze statue of the master, designed by Rauch, on the square before the house.

In 1509–10 Dürer derived pleasure and furnished much amusement to his friends from verse-making, in which he suffered a worse failure even than Raphael had done. It seems that Pirkheimer ridiculed a long-drawn couplet which he had made, upon which the master composed a neat bit of proverbial philosophy, of which the following is a translation:

"Strive earnestly with all thy might,
That God should give thee Wisdom's light;
He doth his wisdom truly prove,
Whom neither death nor riches move;
And he shall also be called wise,
Who joy and sorrow both defies;
He who bears both honor and shame,
He well deserves the wise man's name;
Who knows himself, and evil shuns,
In Wisdom's path he surely runs;
Who 'gainst his foe doth vengeance cherish,
In hell-flame doth his wisdom perish;
Who strives against the Devil's might,
The Lord will help him in the fight;
DÜRER’S RHYMES.

Who keeps his heart forever pure,
He of Wisdom’s crown is sure;
And who loves God with all his heart,
Chooses the wise and better part.”

But Pirkheimer was not more pleased with this; and the witty Secretary Spengler sent Dürer a satirical poem, applying the moral of the fable of the shoemaker who criticised a picture by Apelles. He answered this in a song of sixty lines, closing with,—

“Therefore I will still make rhymes,
Though my friend may laugh at times:
So the Painter with hairy beard
Says to the Writer who mocked and jeered.”

“1510, this have I made on Good and Bad Friends.” Thus the master prefaced a platitudinous poem of thirty lines; which was soon followed by “The Teacher,” of sixty lines. Later in the year he wrote the long Passion-Song, which was appended to the print of Christus am Kreuz. It is composed of eight sections, of ten lines each, and is full of quaint mediæval tenderness and reverence, and the intense prayerfulness of the old German faith. The sections are named Matins, the First, Third, Sixth, and Ninth Hours, Vespers, Compline, and Let Us Pray, the latter of which is redolent with earnest devotion:—

"O Almighty Lord and God,
Who the martyr's press hast trod;
Jesus, the only God, the Son,
Who all this to Thyself hast done,
Keep it before us to-day and to-morrow,
Give us continual rue and sorrow;
Wash me clean, and make me well,
I pray Thee, like a soul from hell.
Lord, Thou hast overcome: look down;
Let us at last to share the crown."

The marvellous high-relief of "The Birth of St. John the Baptist" was executed in 1510, and shows Dürer's remarkable powers as a sculptor. It is cut in a block of cream-colored lithographic stone, $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ inches in size, and is full of rich and minute pictorial details. Elizabeth is rising in bed, aided by two attendants; and the old nurse brings the infant to Zacharias, who writes its name on a tablet, while two men are entering at the doorway. The room is furnished with the usual utensils and properties of a German bedroom. This wonderful and well-preserved work of art was bought in the Netherlands about eighty years ago, for $2,500, and is now in the British Museum. The companion-piece, "St. John the Baptist Preaching in the Wilderness," is now in the Brunswick Museum, and is carved with a similar rich effect. This museum also contains a carving in wood, representing the "Ecce Homo."

Space would fail to tell of the many beautiful little pieces of sculpture which Dürer executed in ivory, boxwood, and stone, or of the numerous excellently designed medals ascribed to him. Chief among these was the exquisite "Birth of Christ," and the altar of agate, formerly at Vienna; Adam and Eve, in wood, at Gotha; reliefs of the Birth and the Agony of Christ, in ivory; the Four Evangelists, in boxwood, lately at Baireuth; several carvings on ivory, of religious scenes, at Munich; a woman with padlocked mouth, sitting in the stocks, cut in soapstone; a delicate relief of the Flight into Egypt; busts of the Duke and Duchess of Burgundy; and the Love-Fountain, now at Dresden, with figures of six persons drinking the water.
The famous painting of "The Adoration of the Trinity" was finished in 1511, and represents God the Father holding up His crucified Son for the worship of an immense congregation of saints, while overhead is the mystic Dove, surrounded by a circle of winged cherubs' heads. The kneeling multitude includes princes, prelates, warriors, burghers, and peasants, equally accepting the Athanasian dogma. On the left is a great group of female saints, led by the sweet and stately Virgin Mary; and on the right are the kneeling prophets and apostles, Moses with the tables of the Law, and David with his harp. On the broad terrestrial landscape, far below, Dürer stands alone, by a tall tablet bearing the Latin inscription of his name and the date of the picture. The whole scene is full of light and splendor, delicate beauty of angels, and exquisite minuteness of finish. A century later the Rath of Nuremberg removed this picture from the sepulchral chapel of its founder, and presented it to the Emperor Rudolph II. It is now one of the gems of the Vienna Belvedere.

About this time the master's brother Andreas, the goldsmith, returned to Nuremberg after his long wanderings, and eased the evident anxiety of his family by settling respectably in life. Hans was still in his brother's studio, where he learned his art so well that he afterwards became court-painter to the King of Poland.

In 1511 Dürer published a third edition of the engravings of the Apocalypse, with a warning to piratical engravers that the Emperor had forbidden the sale of copies or impressions other than those of the author, within the Empire, under heavy penalties to transgressors. To the same year belong three of the master's greatest works in engraving on wood.

"The Great Passion" contains twelve folio woodcuts, unequal in their execution, and probably made by different workmen of varying abilities. The vignette is an "Ecce Homo;" and the other subjects are, the Last Supper, Christ at Gethsemane, His Betrayal, the Scourging, the Mockery, Christ Bearing the Cross, the Crucifixion, the Descent into Hell, the Marys Mourning over Christ's Body, the Entombment, and the Resurrection. These powerful delineations of the Agony of Our Lord are characterized by rare originality of conception, pathos, and grandeur. They were furnished with Latin verses by the monk Chelidonius, and bore the imperial warning against imitation. Four large editions were printed from these cuts, and numerous copies, especially in Italy, where the Emperor's edict was inoperative.

"The Little Passion" was a term applied by Dürer himself to distinguish his series of thirty-seven designs from the larger pictures of "The Great Passion." It is the best-known of the master's engravings; and has been published in two editions at Nuremberg, a third at Venice in 1612, and a fourth at London in 1844. The blocks are now in the British Museum, and show plainly that they were not engraved by Dürer. This great pictorial scene of the fall and redemption of man begins with the sin of Adam and Eve, and their expulsion from Eden, and follows with thirty-three compositions from the life and passion of Christ, ending with the Descent of the Holy Ghost and the Last Judgment. Its title was Figvrae Passionis Domini Nostri Jesu Christi; and it was furnished with a set of the Latin verses of Chelidonius.

The third of Dürer's great works in wood-

a most exquisite manner, close after their publication. Vasari says, "It happened that at this time certain Flemings came to Venice with a great many prints, engraved both in wood and copper by Albert Dürer, which being seen by Marc Antonio in the Square of St. Mark, he was so much astonished by their style of execution, and the skill displayed by Albert, that he laid out on those prints almost all the money he had brought with him from Bologna, and amongst other things purchased 'The Passion of Jesus Christ,' engraved on thirty-six wooden blocks. . . . Marc Antonio therefore, having considered how much honor as well as advantage might be acquired by one who should devote himself to that art in Italy, resolved to attend to it with the greatest diligence, and immediately began to copy these engravings of Albert, studying their mode of hatching, and every thing else in the prints he had purchased, which from their novelty as well as beauty, were in such repute that every one desired to possess them."

It appears that Marc Antonio was afterwards enjoined from using Durer's monogram on his copies of the Nuremberger's engravings, either by imperial diplomatic representations to the Italian courts, or else as the result of a visit which some claim that Dürer made to Italy for that purpose. Many of the copies of Marc Antonio were rather idealized adaptations than exact reproductions of the German's designs, but were furnished with the forged monogram A. D., and sold for Dürer's works. Sixty-nine of our artist's engravings were copied by the skilful Italian, profoundly influencing Southern art by the manual dexterity of the North. This wholesale piracy was carried on between 1505 and 1511, and before Marc Antonio passed under Raphael's overmastering influence.

In later years the Rath of Nuremberg warned the booksellers of the city against selling false copies of Dürer's engravings, and sent letters to the authorities of Augsburg, Leipsic, Frankfort, Strasbourg, and Antwerp, asking them to put a stop to such sales within their jurisdictions. His works have been copied by more than three hundred artists, the best of whom were Solis, Rota, the Hopfers, Wierx, Vischer, Schon, and Kraus.

In 1512 Dürer made most of the plates for
"The Passion in Copper," a series of sixteen engravings on copper, which was begun in 1507 and finished in 1513. These plates show the terrible scenes of the last griefs of the Saviour, surrounded with uncouth German men and women, buildings and landscapes, yet permeated with mysterious reverence and solemn simplicity. The series was never published in book form, with descriptive text, but the engravings were put forth singly as soon as completed. The prints of "Christ Bound" and "St. Jerome" were published this same year.

In 1512 Dürer was first employed by the Emperor Maximilian, who was not only a patron of the arts but also an artist himself, and munificently employed the best painters of Germany, though his treasury was usually but poorly filled. Science and literature also occupied much of his attention; and, while his realm was engaged in perpetual wars, he kept up a careful correspondence on profound themes with many of the foremost thinkers of his day. The records of his intercourse with Dürer are most meagre, though during the seven years of their connection they must have had many interviews, especially while the imperial portrait was being made.
Melanchthon tells a pretty story, which he heard from Dürer himself. One day the artist was finishing a sketch for the Emperor, who, while waiting, attempted to make a drawing himself with one of the charcoal-crayons; but the charcoal kept breaking away, and he complained that he could accomplish nothing with it. Dürer then took it from his hand, saying, “This is my sceptre, your Majesty;” and afterwards taught the sovereign how to use it.

The story which is told of so many geniuses who have risen from low estate is applied also to this one: The Emperor once declared to a noble who had proudly declined to perform some trivial service for the artist, “Out of seven ploughboys I can, if I please, make seven lords, but out of seven lords I cannot make one Dürer.”

Tradition states that the Emperor ennobled Dürer, and gave him a coat-of-arms. Possibly this was the crest used in his later years, consisting of three shields on a blue field, above which is a closed helmet supporting the armless bust and head of a winged negro!

The idea of the immense woodcut of the Triumphal Arch of Maximilian was conceived after 1512, either by the Emperor or by the poet-laureate Stabius; and Dürer was chosen to put it into execution. The history of the deeds of Maximilian, with his ancestry and family alliances, was to be displayed in the form of a pictorial triumphal arch, “after the manner of those erected in honor of the Roman emperors.” The master demanded payment in advance, and received an order from the Emperor to the Rath of Nuremberg to hold “his and the Empire’s true and faithful Albert Dürer exempt from all the town taxes and rates, in consideration of our esteem for his skill in art.” But he surrendered this immunity, in deference to the wishes of the Rath; and Maximilian granted him an annual pension of 100 florins ($200), which was paid, however, somewhat reluctantly.

“The Knight, Death, and the Devil,” is the most celebrated of Dürer’s engravings, and dates from 1513. It shows a panoplied knight riding through a rocky defile, with white-bearded Death advancing alongside and holding up an hourglass, and the loathsome Satan pursuing hard after and clutching at the undismayed knight. The numerous commentators on this picture variously interpret its meaning, some saying that the knight is an evil-doer, intent on wicked purposes, whom Death warns to repentance, while Satan rushes to seize him; others, and the most, that he is the Christian man, fearless among the menaces of Death and Hell, and steadily advancing in spite of the horrible apparitions. Others claim that the Knight represents Franz von Sickingen, a turbulent hero of the Reformation; or Philip Ring, the Nuremberg herald, who was confronted by the Devil on one of his night-rides; or Dürer himself, beset by temptations and fears; or Stephen Baumgartner, the master's friend, whose portrait bears a resemblance to the knight's face. Still another interpretation is given in the romance of "Sintram and his Companions," which was suggested by this engraving, as we are told by its author, La Motte Fouqué.

Kugler says: "I believe I do not exaggerate when I particularize this print as the most important work which the fantastic spirit of German art has ever produced." It was made in Dürer's blooming time, and the plate is a wonderful specimen of delicate and exquisite execution. It has frequently been copied, in many forms,
"The Little Crucifixion" is one of the most exquisitely finished of Dürer's engravings on copper, and is a small round picture, about one inch in diameter, which was made for an ornament on the pommel of the Emperor's sword. It contains seven figures, full of clearness and individuality, and engraved with marvellous skill. There are, fortunately, several very beautiful copies of this print. Other copper-plates of 1513 were "The Judgment of Paris," and the small round "St. Jerome."

The famous Baumgartner altar-piece was painted for the patrician family of that name, as a votive picture, in thanksgiving for the safe return of its knightly members from the Swiss campaigns. Nuremberg unwillingly surrendered it to Maximilian of Bavaria, and it is now in the Munich Pinakothek. It consists of a central picture of "The Nativity," of no special merit, with two wings, the first of which shows Stephen Baumgartner, a meagre-faced and resolute knight, in the character of St. George, while the other portrays the plain-mannered and practical Lucas Baumgartner, in the garb of St. Eustachius. These excellent portrait-figures are clad in armor, and stand by the sides of their horses.
The "Vision of St. Eustachius" was executed on copper-plate, and is one of Dürer's most delicate and beautiful works. It shows the huntsman Eustachius as a strong and earnest German mystic, kneeling before the miraculous crucifix set in the stag's forehead, which has appeared to convict him of his sins, and to stimulate in him that faith by which he led a new life of prayer and praise, and won a martyr's crown. His solemn-faced horse seems to realize that a miracle is taking place; and in the foreground are five delicately drawn hounds. On the steep hill in the rear a noble and picturesque mediæval castle rears its battlemented towers above long lines of cliffs. Tradition says that the face of Eustachius is a portrait of the Emperor Maximilian. When the Emperor Rudolph secured the original plate of the engraving, he had it richly gilded.

"The Great Fortune," or "The Nemesis," is a copper-plate showing a repulsively ugly naked woman, with wings, holding a rich chalice and a bridle, while on the earth below is a beautiful mountain village between two confluent rivers. Sandrart says that this is the Hungarian village of Ét tas, where Dürer's father was born; but there is no proof of this theory. "The Coat-of-Arms with the Cock" is a fine copper-plate, with some obscure allegorical significance, representing, perhaps, Vigilance by the cock which stands on a closed helmet, and Faith by the rampant lion on the shield below.
CHAPTER V.

The copper-plate engraving of “St. Jerome in his Chamber” was executed in 1514, and is one of Dürer’s three greatest works, a marvel of brilliancy and beauty, full of accurate detail and minute perfection. The saint has a grand and venerable head, firmly outlined against a white halo, and is sitting in a cheerful monastic room, lighted by the sun streaming through two large arched windows, while he writes at his desk, translating the Scriptures. In the foreground the lion of St. Jerome is drowsing, alongside a fat watch-dog; a huge pumpkin hangs from one of the oaken beams overhead; and patristic tomes and convenient German utensils are scattered about the room.

“The Virgin on the Crescent Moon” was a copper-plate executed also in 1514, showing the graceful and charming Mary, treated with an idealism which almost suggests Raphael. This is one of the best of the seventeen Mary-pictures (Marien-bilder) which Dürrer executed in copper. Other copper-plates of 1514 represented Sts. Paul and Thomas, the Bagpipe-Player, and a Dancing Rustic and his Wife.

"The Melencolia" is the most weirdly fascinating of Dürrer’s works, and the most mysterious and variously interpreted. It represents a woman, goddess, or devil, fully clad, and bearing keys and a purse at her girdle, her head wreathed with spleenwort, and great wings springing from her shoulders; the while she gazes intently, and with unutterable melancholy, into a magic crystal globe before her. On one side a drowsy Cupid is trying to write, near a ladder which rises from unseen depths to unimagined heights; and on the wall are the balanced scales, the astrological table of figures, the hour-glass running low, and the silent bell. The floor is strewn with scientific and necromantic instruments, and a great cube of strange form lies beyond. The prevailing gloom of the picture is but dimly lighted by a lurid and soli-

early, so that we had to break open her room; for we knew not, as she could not get up, what to do. So we bore her down into a room, and she had the sacraments in both kinds administered to her, for every one thought that she was going to die, for she had been failing in health ever since my father's death. And her custom was to go often to church; and she always punished me when I did not act rightly, and she always took great care to keep me and my brothers from sin; and, whether I went in or out, her constant word was, 'In the name of Christ;' and with great diligence she constantly gave us holy exhortations, and had great care over our souls. And her good works, and the loving compassion that she showed to every one, I can never sufficiently set forth to her praise. This my good mother bore and brought up eighteen children; she has often had the pestilence and many other dangerous and remarkable illnesses; has suffered great poverty, scoffing, disparagement, spiteful words, fears, and great reverses: yet she has never been revengeful. A year after the day on which she was first taken ill . . . my pious mother departed in a Christian manner, with all sacraments, absolved by Papal power from pain and sin. She gave me her blessing, and desired for me God’s peace, and that I should keep myself from evil. And she desired also St. John’s blessing, which she had, and she said she was not afraid to come before God. But she died hard; and I perceived that she saw something terrible, for she kept hold of the holy water, and did not speak for a long time. I saw also how Death came, and gave her two great blows on the heart; and how she shut her eyes and mouth, and departed in great sorrow. I prayed for her, and had such great grief for her that I can never express. God be gracious to her! Her greatest joy was always to speak of God, and to do all to his honor and glory. And she was sixty-three years old when she died, and I buried her honorably according to my means. God the Lord grant that I also make a blessed end, and that God with his heavenly hosts, and my father, mother, and friend, be present at my end, and that the Almighty God grant us eternal life! Amen. And in her death she looked still more lovely than she was in her life.”

In 1514 the prince of Italian painters and the noblest of German artists exchanged pleasant civilities by correspondence, accompanied by specimens of their labors. Dürer sent to Raphael his own portrait, which was afterwards inherited and dearly prized by Giulio Romano. Raphael returned several of his own studies and drawings, one of which, showing two naked men drawn in red crayon, is now preserved in the Albertina at Vienna. It still bears Dürer’s inscription: “Raphael of Urbino, who is so highly esteemed by the Pope, has drawn this study from the nude, and has sent it to Albert Dürer at Nuremberg, in order to show him his hand.”

The invention of the art of etching has been generally attributed to Dürer, though it now seems that he merely improved and perfected the process. There are but few etchings in existence which can certainly be ascribed to him; and the chief of these, an “Ecce Homo” and “Christ in the Garden,” date from 1515. The iron plate of the latter was found two centuries later, in a blacksmith’s shop, where it was about to be made into horse-shoes. A third etching represents a frightfully homely woman being carried off by a man on a unicorn, a wild and incomprehensible composition, calculated to awaken an uncomfortable impression in the beholder. Some of the etchings were on iron, and others on pewter; but none were on copper, which was afterwards universally used. The corrosive nitrous acid acted inefficiently on the metals which he employed, and so his etchings fall short of excellence.

In 1514 Jorg Vierling uttered disgraceful libels and threats against Dürer, and finally attacked him in the street. He was imprisoned by the authorities; but the kind-hearted artist interceded for him, and he was released, after being bound over to keep the peace.

In the same year Dürer wrote to Herr Kress to see if the laureate Stabius had done any thing about his delayed pension; saying also, "But if Herr Stabius has done nothing in my matter, or my desire was too difficult for him to attain, then I pray of you to be my favorable lord to his Majesty. . . . Point out to his Majesty that I have served his Majesty for three years, that I have suffered loss myself from doing so, and that if I had not used my utmost diligence his ornamental work would never have been finished in such a manner; therefore I pray his Majesty to reward me with the 100 guilders." In September an imperial decree was issued, giving Dürer his promised pension of $200 a year out of the tax due from Nuremberg to the Emperor. This annuity was paid to the artist until his death, with one short intermission.

Dürer executed for the Emperor a series of most fantastic and grotesque pen-drawings, on the borders of his prayer-book, now in the Munich town-library. Alongside the solemn sentences of the breviary are whimsical monkeys and pigs, Indians and men-at-arms, satyrs and foxes, screeching devils and saints, hens and prophets, martyrs and German crones, mingled in a weird wonderland, and not inappropriate according to mediæval ideas of taste. "The Great Column" is another quaint and inexplicable engraving, which Dürer did for the Emperor in 1517, and is composed of four blocks 5½ feet high. It shows two naked angels holding a large turnip, from which springs a tall column with two horrible female monsters at the base, and a horned satyr at the top, holding long garlands.

The marvellous "Triumphal Arch of Maximilian” is composed of ninety-two blocks, forming an immense woodcut ten and a half feet high and nine feet wide. It shows three great towers, under which are the three gates of Praise, Nobility, and Honor and Power, with the six chained harpies of temptation, and two vigilant Archdukes in armor, and figures holding garlands and crowns. The great genealogical tree rises above the figures that represent France, Sycambria, and Troy, and bears portrait-like half-figures of the twenty-six Christian princes from whom Maximilian claimed descent, with pictures of himself and his family. There are also twenty-four minutely delicate cuts, showing the most remarkable events in the Emperor’s life, accompanied with rugged explanatory rhymes by the poet-laureate. Dr. von Eye says that “the extent and difficulty of the task appear to have called forth the powers of the artist to their highest exercise. In no work of Dürer’s do we find more beautiful drawing than there is here. Each single piece might be taken out and prized as an independent work of art.”

The master drew these very elaborate and intricate designs between 1512 and 1515; and the enormous work of engraving them was devolved upon Hieronymus Rosch of Nuremberg. During its progress the Emperor frequently visited Rosch’s house in the Fratengasslein; and it became a town saying, that “The Emperor still drives often to Petticoat Lane.” On one of his visits, a number of the artist’s pet cats ran into his presence; whence, it is said, arose the proverb, “A cat may look at a King.”

In 1516 Dürer painted a fine portrait of Wohlgemuth, now at Munich, showing a wrinkled old face lit up by bright eyes, and inscribed, “This portrait has Albert Dürer painted after his master Michael Wohlgemuth, in the year 1516, when he was 82 years old; and he lived until the year 1519, when he died, on St. Andrew’s Day, early, before the sun had risen.” About the same period he designed and partly executed the Pietà, which is now in the St. Maurice Gallery at Nuremberg; and carved a Virgin and Child standing on the crescent moon, similar to the one which he had engraved three years before.

In 1518 Dürer also painted the scene of the death-bed of the Empress Mary of Burgundy, under the title of “The Death of the Virgin,” been copied from Agnes Frey. The portrait of the witty and learned Lazarus Spengler dates from the same year.

When Maximilian died, the Rath of Nuremberg refused to continue the pension which he had granted to Dürer, though the artist addressed its members as "Provident, Honorable, Wise, Gracious, and Dear Lords," and enumerated his services to the dead Emperor. He also vainly demanded the payment of the imperial order for 200 florins, "to be paid to him as if to Maximilian himself, out of the town taxes due to the Emperor on St. Martin's Day," though he offered to leave his house in pledge, so that the town might lose nothing if the new Emperor refused to acknowledge the validity of the claim.

At the time of the death of Maximilian the great woodcut of "The Triumphant Arch" was unfinished, and the blocks remained in the hands of the engraver. Dürer and Rosch published a large round cut containing twenty-one of the historical scenes, as a memorial of the late sovereign, and this singular production speedily went through four editions. A few trial-impressions of the whole Arch had been struck off before the Emperor's death, two of which are now at Copenhagen, one in the British Museum, and one at Stockholm. In 1559 the first edition of the entire Arch was printed at Vienna, at the request of the Archduke Ferdinand, and another edition was issued by Bartsch in 1799.

In 1519 Dürer published an excellent wood-engraving of the late Emperor Maximilian, with inscriptions recording his titles and the date of his death. It showed a pleasant face, full of strength and character. Among the painted portraits of Maximilian which are attributed to the master, the best is in the Vienna Belvedere; and another was in the late Northwick Collection, in England. A beautiful portrait in water-colors is in the library of the Erlangen University.

In 1519 Dürer also prepared an exquisitely finished copper-plate engraving of "St. Anthony," showing the meditative hermit before a background of a quaint mediæval city, very like Nuremberg, abounding in irregular gable-roofs and tall castle-towers. Several admirable copies of this work have been made.
CHAPTER VI.

Dürer’s famous tour to the Netherlands began in the summer of 1520, and continued until late in 1521. His main object appears to have been to secure from Charles V. a confirmation of the pension which the Emperor Maximilian had granted him, since the Rath of Nuremberg had refused to deliver any further sums until he could obtain such a ratification. Possibly he also hoped to obtain the position of court-painter, to which Titian was afterwards appointed. Several biographers say that Dürer made the journey in order to get a respite from his wife’s tirades; but this is unlikely, since he took her and her maid Susanna with him. The Archduchess Margaret, daughter of the late Emperor Maximilian and aunt of Charles V., was at Brussels, acting as Regent of the Netherlands; and Dürrer made strong but ineffectual attempts to secure her good graces.

Dürer's journal of his tour is a combination of cash-account, itinerary, memoranda, and notebook, and would fill about fifty of these pages. It is usually barren of reflections, opinions, or prolonged descriptions; and is but a terse and business-like record of facts and expenses, rich only in its revelations of mediæval Flemish hospitality and municipal customs, and certain personal habits of the writer. The greatest impression seems to have been made upon the traveller by the enormous wealth of the Low Countries, and the adjective "costly" continually recurs. The new-found treasures of America were then pouring a stream of gold into the Flemish cities, and manufactures and commerce were in full prosperity. The devastating storm of Alva's Spanish infantry had not yet swept over the doomed but heroic Netherlands; and her great cities basked in peace, prosperity, and wealth.

"On the Thursday after Whitsuntide, I, Albert Dürer, at my own cost and responsibility, set out with my wife from Nuremberg for the Netherlands. . . . I went on to Bamberg, where I gave the Bishop a picture of the Virgin, 'The Life of the Virgin,' an Apocalypse, and other engravings of the value of a florin. He invited me to dinner, and gave me an exemption from customs, and three letters of recommendation." He hired a carriage to take him to Frankfort for eight florins of gold, and received a parting stirrup-cup from Meister Benedict, and the painter Hans Wolfgang Katzheimer. He gives the names of the forty-three villages through which he passed along the route by Wurzburg and Carlstadt to Frankfort, with his expenditures for food and for gifts to servants; and tells how the Bishop's letter freed him from paying tolls. At Frankfort he was cheaply entertained by Jacob Heller, for whom he had painted "The Coronation of the Virgin." From thence he descended by boat to Mayence, where he received many gifts and attentions. In the river-passages hence to Cologne, he was forced to haul in shore and arrange his tolls at Ehrenfels, Bacharach, Caub, St. Goar, and Boppard. At Cologne he was entertained by his cousin Nicholas Dürer, who had learned the goldsmith's trade in the shop of Albert's father, and was now settled in business. The master made presents to him and his wife. The Barefooted Monks gave Dürer a feast at their monastery; and Jerome Fugger presented him with wine. The journey was soon resumed; and the master passed through fourteen villages, and at last reached Antwerp, where he was feasted by the factor of the illustrious Fugger family. Jobst Planckfelt was Durer's host while he remained in the city, and showed him the Burgomaster's Palace and other sights of Antwerp, besides introducing him to Quentin Matsys and other eminent Flemish artists.

"On St. Oswald's Day, the painters invited me to their hall, with my wife and maid; and everything there was of silver and other costly ornamentation, and extremely costly viands. There were also all their wives there; and when I was conducted to the table all the people stood up on each side, as if I had been a great lord. There were amongst them also many persons of distinction, who all bowed low, and in the most humble manner testified their pleasure at seeing me, and they said they would do all in their power to give me pleasure. And, as I sat at table, there came in the messenger of the Rath of Antwerp, who presented me with four tankards of wine in the name of the Magistrates; and he said that they desired to honor me with this, and that I should have their good-will. . . . And for a long time we were very merry together until quite late in the night; then they accompanied us home with torches in the most honorable manner, and they begged us to accept their good-will, and said they would do whatever I desired that might be of assistance to me. Then I thanked them, and went to bed."

He next speaks of making portraits of his friend the Portuguese consul, his host Planck-felt, and the musician Felix Hungersberg; and keeps account of his sales of paintings and engravings, on the same pages which record his junketings with various notable men. He dined with one of the Imhoffs and with Meister Joachim Patenir, the landscape-painter, with whom he had certain professional transactions. He soon became intimately acquainted with the three Genoese brothers, Tomasin, Vincent, and Gerhartus Florianus, with whom he dined many times, and for whom he drew several portraits. He also met

In September Dürer and Tomasin journeyed to Mechlin, where they invited Meister Conrad and one of his artist-friends to a supper. The next day they passed through Vilvorde, and came to Brussels. Here the master was introduced to a new and splendid society and a city rich in works of art. He speaks of dining with "My Lord of Brussels," the Imperial Councillor Bannisius, and the ambassadors of Nuremberg; and Bernard van Orley, formerly a pupil of Raphael and now court-painter to the Regent Margaret, invited him to a feast at which he met the Regent's treasurer, the royal court-master, and the town-treasurer of Brussels. He also visited the Margrave of Anspach and Baireuth, with a letter of introduction from the Bishop of Bamberg; and drew portraits of Meister Conrad, Bernard van Orley, and several others. The Regent Margaret received him "with especial kindness," and promised to use her influence for his advancement at the imperial court. He presented copies of the Passion to her and her treasurer, and many other engravings to other eminent persons in the city.

"And I have seen King Charles's house at Brussels, with its fountains, labyrinth, and park."
It gave me the greatest pleasure; and a more delightful thing, and more like a Paradise, I have never before seen. . . . At Brussels there is a very big and costly Town-hall, built of hewn stone, with a splendid transparent tower. I have seen in the Golden Hall the four painted matters which the great Meister Rudier [Roger van der Weyden] has done. . . . I have also been into the Nassau-house, which is built in such a costly style and so beautifully ornamented. And I saw the two beautiful large rooms and all the costly things in the house everywhere, and also the great bed in which fifty men might lie; and I have also seen the big stone which fell in a thunderstorm in the field close to the Count of Nassau. This house is very high, and there is a fine view from it, and it is much to be admired; and I do not think in all Germany there is any thing like it. . . . Also I have seen the thing which has been brought to the King from the new Golden Land [Mexico], a sun of gold a fathom broad, and a silver moon just as big. Likewise two rooms full of armor; likewise all kinds of arms, harness, and wonderful missiles, very strange clothing, bed-gear and all kinds of the most wonderful things for man's use, that are as beautiful to behold as they are wonderful. These things are all so costly, that they have been valued at 100,000 gulden. And I have never in all the days of my life seen anything that has so much rejoiced my heart as these things. For I have seen among them wonderfully artistic things, and I have wondered at the subtle Ingenia of men in foreign lands."

While at Brussels Dürer was the guest of Conrad the sculptor, and Ebner the Nuremberg ambassador. He returned at length to Antwerp, where his Portuguese friends sent him several maiolica bowls and some Calcutta feathers, and his host gave also certain Indian and Turkish curiosities. The jovial dinners with Planckfelter and Tomasin were again begun, and were supplemented by feasts with the Von Rogendorffs and Fugger's agent. The master gave away hundreds of his engravings here, either to his friends or to influential courtiers; and all these details he faithfully records. He seems to have been an indefatigable investigator and collector of curiosities, imported trinkets, and china. With childlike delight he narrates the brilliant spectacles around him.
"I have seen, on the Sunday after the Assumption of Our Blessed Lady, the great procession from Our Lady's Church at Antwerp, when the whole town was assembled, artisans and people of rank, every one dressed in the most costly manner according to its station. Every class and every guild had its badge by which it might be recognized; large and costly tapers were also borne by some of them. There were also long silver trumpets of the old Frankish fashion. There were also many German pipers and drummers, who piped and drummed their loudest. Also I saw in the street, marching in a line in regular order, with certain distances between, the goldsmiths, painters, stonemasons, embroiderers, sculptors, joiners, carpenters, sailors, fishmongers, ... and all kinds of artisans who are useful in producing the necessaries of life. In the same way there were the shopkeepers and merchants and their clerks. After these came the marksmen with firelocks, bows, and cross-bows, some on horseback and some on foot. After that came the City Guards; and at last a mighty and beautiful throng of different nations and religious orders, superbly costumed, and each distinguished from the other, very piously. I remarked in this procession a troop of widows who lived by their labor. They all had white linen cloths covering their heads, and reaching down to their feet, very seemly to behold. Behind them I saw many brave persons, and the canons of Our Lady's Church, with all the clergy and bursars, where twenty persons bore Our Lady with the Lord Jesus ornamented in the most costly manner to the glory of the Lord God. In this procession there were many very pleasant things, and it was very richly arranged. There were brought along many wagons, with moving ships, and other things. Then followed the Prophets, all in order; the New Testament, showing the Salutation of the Angel, the three Holy Kings on their camels, and other rare wonders very beautifully arranged. . . . At the last came a great dragon led by St. Margaret and her maidens, who were very pretty; also St. George, with his squire, a very handsome Courlander. Also a great many boys and girls, dressed in the most costly and ornamental manner, according to the fashion of different countries, rode in this troop, and represented so many saints. This procession from beginning to end was more than two hours passing by our house; and there were so many things that I could never write them all down even in a book, and so I leave it alone."

Raphael died during this year, and Dürer made strenuous efforts to secure some of his drawings or other remains. He met Tommaso Vincidore of Bologna, a pupil of the great master, and gave him an entire set of his best engravings for an antique gold ring, and another set to be sent to Rome in exchange for some of Raphael’s sketches. He also gave a complete set of his engravings to the Regent Margaret, and made for her two careful drawings on parchment. Vincidore painted his portrait, to be sent to Rome; and it was engraved by Adrian Stock, showing his glorious eyes and long flowing hair, together with a short dense beard overshadowed by a massive moustache, curled back at the points.

Later in the autumn Dürer journeyed to Aix-la-Chapelle where he attended the splendid ceremonies of the coronation of the Emperor Charles V. At Aix he saw the famous columns brought from Rome by Charlemagne, the arm of Kaiser Henry, the chemise and girdle of the Virgin Mary, and other relics. His wife was back at Antwerp; and so the reckless artist chronicles his outlays for drinking, gaming, and other reprehensible expenses. After being entertained for three weeks at the Nuremberg embassy, Dürer went to Cologne, where he remained a fortnight, distributing his engravings with generous hand, visiting the churches and their pictures, and buying all manner of odd things. Early in November, by the aid of the Nuremberg ambassadors, he obtained from the Emperor his Confirmatia, "with great trouble and labor." This coveted document, which formed one of the main objects of his journey to the North, confirmed him in the pension which Maximilian had granted him, and made him painter to the Emperor.

From Cologne he returned with all speed down the river to Antwerp, being entertained at Boisle-Duc, "a pretty town, which has an extraordinarily beautiful church," by the painter Arnold de Ber and the goldsmiths, "who showed me very much honor." On arriving at Antwerp, he resumes his accounts of the sales and gifts of his engravings, and the enumeration of his domestic expenses. Soon afterward he heard of a mon-

heavy cable broke, and a strong wind came on, which drove our ship powerfully before it. Then we all cried loudly for help, but no one ventured to give it; and the wind beat us out again to sea. Then there was great anxiety and fear; for the wind was very great, and not more than six persons on board. But I spoke to the skipper, and told him to take heart, and put his trust in God, and consider what there was to be done. Then he said he thought, if we could manage to hoist the little sail, he would try whether we could not get on. So with great difficulty, and working all together, we got it half way up, and sailed on again; and when those on the land saw this, and how we were able to help ourselves, they came and gave us assistance, so that we got safely to land. Middleburg is a good town, and has a very beautiful Town-house with a costly tower. And there are also many things there of old art. There is an exceedingly costly and beautiful seat in the abbey, and a costly stone aisle, and a pretty parish church. And in other respects also the town is very rich in subjects for sketches. Zealand is pretty and marvellous to see, on account of the water, which is higher than the land.”
The tide had carried off the stranded whale; and so Dürer returned to Antwerp, staying a few days at Bergen. Soon afterwards he gave Von Rafensburg three books of fine engravings in return for five snail-shells, nine medals, four arrows, two pieces of white coral, two dried fish, and a scale of a large fish. Improvident collector of curiosities! how did the matronly Agnes endure such tradings? Many dinners with the Genoese Tomasin are then recorded, and fresh collations with new friends, in the hearty and hospitable spirit of the easy-living Netherlanders. He repaid the quaint presents of his admirers with many copies of his engravings, and occasionally made some money in the practice of his profession.

"On Shrove Tuesday early the goldsmiths invited me and my wife to dinner. There were many distinguished people assembled, and we had an extremely costly meal, and they did me exceeding much honor; and in the evening the senior magistrate of the town invited me, and gave me a costly meal, and showed me much honor. And there came in many strange masks." He then records his exchanges of engravings for such singular returns as satin, candied citron, ivory salt-cellars from Calcutta, seashells, monk's electuary, sweetmeats in profusion, porcelains, an ivory pipe, coral, boxing-gloves, a shield, lace, fishes' fins, sandal-wood, &c. The Portuguese ambassador invited him to a rich Carnival feast, where there were "many very costly masks;" and the learned Petrus Ægidius entertained him and Erasmus of Rotterdam together. He climbed up the cathedral tower, and "saw over the whole town from it, which was very agreeable." Many of the curiosities which he had acquired were sent as presents to Pirkheimer, the Imhoffs, the Holzschuhers, and other noble friends in Nuremberg. Arion, the ex-Pensionary of Antwerp, gave him a feast, and presented him with Patenir's painting of "Lot and his Daughters."

Soon after Easter, Dürrer made another pleasant tour in the Netherlands, attended by the painter Jan Plos, passing by "the rich Abbey of Pol," and "the great long village of Kahlb," to "the splendid and beautiful town" of Bruges. Plos and the goldsmith Marx each gave him costly feasts, and showed him the Emperor's palace, the Archery Court, and many paintings by Roger van der Weyden, Hubert and Jan van Eyck, and Hugo van der Goes, together with an alabaster Madonna by Michael Angelo. "We came at last to the Painters' Chapel, where there are many good things. After that they prepared a banquet for me. And from thence I went with them to their guild, where many honorable folk, goldsmiths, painters, and merchants, were assembled; and they made me sup with them, and did me great honor. And the Rath gave me twelve measures of wine; and the whole assembly, more than sixty persons, accompanied me home with torches.

"And when I arrived at Ghent, the chief of the painters met me, and he brought with him all the principal painters of the town; and they showed me great honor, and received me in very splendid style, and they assured me of their good-will and service; and I supped that evening with them. On Wednesday early they took me to St. John's Tower, from which I saw over all the great and wonderful town. After that I saw Johann's picture [Van Eyck's "Adoration of the Spotless Lamb"]. It is a very rich and grandly conceived painting; and particularly Eve, the Virgin Mary, and God the Father, are excellent. . . . Ghent is a beautiful and wonderful town, and four great waters flow through it. And I have besides seen many other very strange things at Ghent, and the painters with their chief have never left me; and I have eaten morning and night with them, and they have paid for every thing, and have been very friendly with me.”

The master soon returned to Antwerp, in distress. “In the third week after Easter a hot fever attacked me, with great faintness, discomfort, and headache. And when I was in Zealand, some time back, a wonderful illness came upon me, which I had never heard of any one having before; and this illness I have still.” This low fever never quite left him, and was the cause of many doctor’s bills thereafter. Soon afterward he made a portrait of the landscape-painter Joachim Patenir; and “on the Sunday before Cross-week, Meister Joachim invited me to his wedding, and they all showed me much respect; and I saw two very pretty plays there, particularly the first, which was very pious and clerical.”

Dürer seems to have had strong Protestant sympathies, though it is claimed that he died in the faith of Rome. His journal in 1521 contains the following significant sentences about Martin Luther: "He was a man enlightened by the Holy Ghost, and a follower of the true Christian faith. . . . He has suffered much for Christ’s truth, and because he has rebuked the unchristian Papacy which strives against the freedom of Christ with its heavy burdens of human laws; and for this we are robbed of the price of our blood and sweat, that it may be expended shamefully by idle, lascivious people, whilst thirsty and sick men perish of hunger. . . . Lord Jesus Christ, call together again the sheep of thy fold, of whom part are still to be found amongst the Indians, Muscovites, Russians, and Greeks, who through the burdens and avarice of the Papacy have been separated from us. Never were any people so horribly burdened with ordinances as us poor people by the Romish See; we who, redeemed by thy blood, ought to be free Christians.

"O God, is Luther dead? Who will henceforth explain to us so clearly the holy Gospel? O all pious Christian men, bewail with me this God-inspired man, and pray to God to send us another enlightened teacher! O Erasmus of Rotterdam, where dost thou remain? Behold how the unjust tyranny of this world's might and the powers of darkness prevail! Hear, thou knight of Christ; ride forth in the name of the Lord, defend the truth, attain the martyr's crown; thou art already an old manikin, and I have heard thee say that thou gavest thyself only two years longer in which thou wilt still be fit for work. Employ these well, then, in the cause of the Gospel and the true Christian faith."

More junketings, gamings, collecting of outlandish things, visits to religious and civic pageants, new sketches and paintings, doctor's bills and monk's fees, minutely recorded. "Meister Gerhard, the illuminator, has a daughter of eighteen years, called Susanna; and she has illuminated a plate, a Saviour, for which I gave a florin. It is a great wonder that a woman should do so well! . . . I have again and again done sketches and many other things in the service of different persons, and for the most part of my work I have received nothing at all."

other's personal appearance, but had a warm mutual respect and esteem. Dürer next struck up a warm friendship with certain of the Augustine monks, and dined often at their cloister. In addition to the bric-à-brac which he still continued to collect, he now began to buy precious stones, in which he was badly swindled by a Frenchman, and dolefully wrote, "I am a fool at a bargain."

He was now about to return home, and naturally found it necessary, after having bought such a museum of oddities and curiosities, to borrow enough money to take him to Nuremberg. His friend Alexander Imhoff lent him 100 gold florins, receiving Dürer's note in return. In some bitterness of spirit he wrote: "In all my transactions in the Netherlands, with people both of high and low degree, and in all my doings, expenses, sales, and other trafficking, I have always had the disadvantage; and particularly the Lady Margaret, for all I have given her and done for her, has given me nothing in return."

On the eve of Dürer's departure, the King of Denmark, Christian II., came to Antwerp, and not only had the master draw his portrait, but also invited him to a dinner. He then went to Brussels, on business for his new royal patron, and was present at the pompous reception and banquet with which the Emperor and the Archduchess Margaret received the Danish King. Soon afterwards the King invited Dürer to the feast which he gave to the Emperor and Archduchess; and then had his portrait painted in oil-colors, paying thirty florins for it. After a sojourn of eight days in Brussels, the master and his wife went south to Cologne, spending four long days on the road; and soon afterwards prolonged their journey to Nuremberg.

The municipality of Antwerp had offered him a house and a liberal pension, to remain in that city; but he declined these, being content with his prospects and his noble friends in Franconia.
CHAPTER VII.

What a commotion must Dürer's return have caused in Nuremberg, with his commission as court-painter, and his bales and crates of rarities from America and India and all Europe! The presents which he had brought for so many of his friends must have given the liveliest delight, and afforded amusement for months to the Sodalitas Literaria and the Rath-Elders.

In the mean time the purifying storm of the Reformation was sweeping over Germany, and the people were in times of great doubt and perplexity. Nuremberg was the first of the free cities of the Empire to pronounce herself Protestant, though the change was effected with so much order and moderation that no iconoclastic fury was allowed to dilapidate its churches and convents. Pirkheimer and Spengler were excommunicated by the Pope, though their calm conservatism had curbed the fanatical fury of the puritans, and saved the Catholic art-treasures of the Franconian capital.

It is a significant fact that Dürer, during the last six years of his life, made no more Madonnas, and but one Holy Family. The era of Mariolatry had passed, so far as Nuremberg was concerned. Yet, during the year of his return from the Netherlands, he made two engravings of St. Christopher bearing the Holy Child safely above the floods and through the storms, as if to indicate that Christianity would be carried through all its disasters by an unfailing strength.

During the remaining six years of his life Dürer's art-works were limited to a few portraits and engravings, and the great pictures of the Four Apostles. Much of his time was devoted to the publication of the fruits of his long experience, in several literary treatises, most of which are now lost. His broken health would not allow of continuous work, as the inroads of insidious disease slowly wasted his strength and eat away his vitality.
The Little Masters were a group of artists who were formed in the studio or under the influence of Dürer, shining as a bright constellation of genius in the twilight of German art. Among these were the Bavarian Altdorfer, who combined in his brilliant paintings and engravings both fantasy and romanticism; the Westphalian Aldegrever, a laborious painter and a prolific engraver; Barthel Beham, who afterwards studied with and counterfeited the works of Marc Antonio in Italy; Hans Sebald Beham, who illustrated lewd fables and prayer books with equal skill and relish, and was finally driven from Nuremberg; Jacob Binck of Cologne, a neat and accurate draughtsman, who removed to Rome, and engraved Raphael’s works under the supervision of Marc Antonio; George Pensz, who also studied under the great Italian engraver, and executed 126 fine prints, besides several paintings. Other assistants and pupils of Dürer, of whom little but their names are now remembered, were Hans Brosamer of Fulda, and Hans Springinklee. Hans von Culmbach was a careful follower, who surpassed his master in love of nature and her warm and harmonious colors. The Tucher altar-piece in St. Sebald's Church was his master-picture. Contemporary with the Nuremberg painter, Matthew Grunewald was doing excellent work at Aschaffenburg, in northern Franconia. Among the German artists of his time, he was surpassed only by Dürrer and Holbein.

The Diet of the Empire was held at Nuremberg in 1522, and the Rath-haus was repainted and decorated for its sessions. Dürrer was paid 100 florins for his share in this work, although it is not known what it was. The best of the paintings were executed by his pupil, George Pensz, and it is probable that the master furnished some of the designs.

Although our artist held a pension from the Emperor as his court-painter, his services seem to have never been called into requisition. Charles spent but little time at Nuremberg, and while yet in his youth had no care for seeing himself portrayed on canvas. It was after the master's death that the Emperor first met Titian, and retained him as court-painter.

In 1522 Dürrer published at his own cost the first edition of the Triumphal Car of Kaiser
Maximilian, a woodcut whose labored and ponderous allegorical idea was conceived by Pirkheimer, designed in detail by Dürer, and engraved by Rosch on eight blocks, forming a picture 7½ feet long by 1½ feet high. The Emperor is shown seated in a chariot, surrounded by female figures representing the abstract virtues, while the leaders of the twelve horses, and even the wheels and reins, have magniloquent Latin names. Maximilian was greatly interested in this work, but died before its completion. The first edition was accompanied by explanatory German text, and the second by Latin descriptions.

The large woodcut of Ulrich Varnbühler, whom Dürer calls his “single friend,” is one of the master’s best works, and was printed over with three blocks, to produce a chiaroscuro. A little later, he made two copper-plates of the Cardinal Archbishop Albert of Magdeburg and Mayence.

In 1523, while under the influence of the art-schools of the Lower Rhine, the master painted the pictures of Sts. Joachim and Joseph and St. Simeon and Bishop Lazarus, small figures on a gold ground.

Dürer's Family Relation records that, “My

Pirkheimer’s portrait was engraved in 1524, showing a gross and heavy face, obese to the last degree, and verifying in its physiognomy the probability that the playful innuendoes in Dürer’s Venetian letters were well grounded. It is not easy to see how such a spirit, learned in all the sciences of the age, and in close communion with Erasmus, Melanchthon, and Ulrich von Hutten, could have worn such a drooping mask of flesh. In the same year, Dürer published an engraved portrait of Frederick the Wise, Elector of Saxony, the supporter of Luther and the political leader of the Reformation. The head is admirably drawn and full of character, with firmness plainly indicated by strongly compressed lips.

The following letter to the Council of Nuremberg was written in the year 1524:

“Provident, Honorable, Wise, and Most Favorable Lords,—By my works and with the help of God, I have acquired 1,000 florins of the Rhine, and I would now willingly lay them by for my support. Although I know that it is not the custom with yourWisdoms to pay high interest, and that you have refused to give one florin in twenty; yet I am moved by my necessity, by the particularly favorable regard which your Wis-doms have ever shown towards me, and also by the following causes, to beg this thing of your Honors. Your Wisdoms know that I have always been obedient, willing, and diligent in all things done for your Wisdoms, and for the common State, and for other persons of the Rath, and that the State has always had my help, art, and work, whenever they were needed, and that without payment rather than for money; for I can write with truth, that, during the thirty years that I have had a house in this town, I have not had 500 guldens' worth of work from it, and what I have had has been poor and mean, and I have not gained the fifth part for it that it was worth;
but all that I have earned, which God knows has only been by hard toil, has been from princes, lords, and other foreign persons. Also I have expended all my earnings from foreigners in this town. Also your Honors doubtless know that, on account of the many works I had done for him, the late Emperor Maximilian, of praiseworthy memory, out of his own imperial liberality granted me an exemption from the rates and taxes of this town, which, however, I voluntarily gave up, when I was spoken to about it by the Elders of the Rath, in order to show honor to my Lords, and to maintain their favor and uphold their customs and justice.

"Nineteen years ago the Doge of Venice wrote to me, offering me 200 ducats a year if I would live in that city. More lately the Rath of Antwerp, while I remained in the Low Countries, also made me an offer, 300 florins of Philippe a year, and a fair mansion to live in. In both places all that I did for the Government would have been paid over and above the pension. All of which, out of my love for my honorable and wise Lords, for this town, and for my Fatherland, I refused, and chose rather to live simply, near your Wisdoms, than to be rich and great in any other place. It is therefore my dutiful request to your Lordships, that you will take all these things into your favorable consideration, and accept these thousand florins (which I could easily lay out with other worthy people both here and elsewhere, but which I would rather know were in the hands of your Wisdoms), and grant me a yearly interest upon them of fifty florins, so that I and my wife, who are daily growing old, weak, and incapable, may have a moderate provision against want. And I will ever do my utmost to deserve your noble Wisdoms' favor and approbation, as heretofore."

This touching letter shows the poverty of Dürer's savings, and his sad feeling that he had lived as a prophet without honor in his own country. It produced the desired effect, and brought him five per cent on his little capital, though after his death the Council hastened to reduce it to four per cent.

Dürer's wide study and remarkable versatility, rivalling that of Leonardo da Vinci, found further expression in literary work. Camerarius states that he wrote a hundred and fifty different treatises, showing a marked proficiency in several of the sciences. His first work was entitled "Instruction in the Art of Mensuration," &c., and was published in 1525 for the use of young painters. It is composed of four books, treating of the practical use of geometrical instruments, and the drawing of volutes, Roman letters, and winding stairs; and is illustrated by numerous woodcuts. The fourth book elucidates the idea of perspective, and contains pictures of an instrument devised by the author, "which will be found particularly useful to persons who are not sure of drawing correctly." This was not the only invention of Dürer's; for there still exists a small model of a gun-carriage in wood and iron, made by him, and exhibiting certain improvements which he had designed and advocated. "The Art of Mensuration" was a successful book, and passed through one Latin and three German editions.

The finest of Dürer's works in portraiture was executed in 1526, and represents the grand old Jerome Holzschuher, one of the chief rulers of the city, with all the strength and keenness of his heroic nature lighting up the canvas. Enormous sums have been offered for this work; but it is still faithfully preserved in Nuremberg, and retains its original rich and vivid coloring. Another fine portrait, "like an antique bust," now in the Vienna Belvedere, shows Johann Kleeberger, the generous and charitable man who was known abroad as "the good German." Still another portrait of this year was that of the Burgomaster Jacob Müffel, a well-modelled and carefully executed likeness of one of the master's best friends. Two very famous engravings of this date portray Erasmus of Rotterdam and Philip Melanchthon. Erasmus is represented as a venerable scholar, sitting at a desk, with a pen in his hand and a soft cap on his head; and the engraving is remarkable for its admirable execution and strong character. Still, the old philosopher was not pleased with it, and sent to Sir Thomas More his portrait by Holbein, which, he said, “is much more like me than the one by the famous Albert Dürer.” When Erasmus first saw the picture he said, “Oh! if I still resemble that Erasmus, I may look out for getting married,” as if it gave him too young an appearance.

In 1526 the wise and noble-hearted Melanchthon came to Nuremberg to establish a Protestant Latin school, and formed a close intimacy with the master, whose tender and dreamy spirit was so like his own. During their constant intercourse, the artist became strengthened and comforted in the mild and pure doctrines of the true reformation, and was quietly yet strongly influenced to abandon even the forms of Catholicism which still remained. Dürer published a fine engraving of this friend of his last

CHAPTER VIII.

Schlegel says that "Albert Dürer may be called the Shakespeare of Painting;" and it is doubtless true that he filled out the narrow capabilities of early German art with a full measure of deep and earnest thought and powerful originality. The equal homage which was offered to him at Venice and Antwerp, the two art-antipodes, shows how highly he was regarded in his own day. His earlier works were executed in the crude and angular methods of Wohlgemuth and his contemporaries; and most of the pictures now attributed to him, often incorrectly, are of this character. But in his later works he swung clear of these trammelling archaisms, and produced brilliant and memorable compositions.

"The Four Apostles," now in the Munich
Pinakothek, were Dürer’s last and noblest works, and fairly justify Pirkheimer’s assurance, that if he had lived longer the master would have done "many more wonderful, strange, and artistic things." They are full of grand thought and clear insight, free from exaggeration or conventionalism, perfect in execution and harmonious simplicity, and so distinct in individuality that it has been generally believed that the Four Temperaments are here impersonated. On one panel are Sts. John and Peter, in life-size, the former deeply meditating, with the Scriptures in his hand, and the latter bending forward and earnestly reading the Holy Book. The other panel shows the stately St. Paul, robed in white, standing before the ardent and impassioned St. Mark. Kugler calls these panels "the first complete work of art produced by Protestantism;" and the truth and simplicity of the paintings prefigured the return of a pure and incorrupt faith.

Late in 1526, Dürer sent these pictures to the Rath of Nuremberg, with the following letter: "Provident, Honorable, Wise, Dear Lords,—I have been for some time past minded to present your Wisdoms with something of my unworthy painting as a remembrance; but I have been obliged to give this up on account of the defects of my poor work, for I knew that I should not have been well able to maintain the same before your Wisdoms. During this past time, however, I have painted a picture, and bestowed more diligence upon it than upon any other painting; therefore I esteem no one worthier than your Wisdoms to keep it as a remembrance; on which account I present the same to you herewith, begging you with humble diligence to accept my little present graciously and favorably, and to be and remain my favorable and dear Lords, as I have always hitherto found you. This, with the utmost humility, I will sedulously endeavor to merit from your Wisdoms.”

The Rath eagerly accepted this noble gift, and hung the two panels in the Rath-haus, sending also a handsome present of money to Dürer and his wife. A century afterwards Maximilian of Bavaria saw and coveted the pictures, and used bribery and threats alike to secure them. In 1627 he accomplished his purpose; and the Rath, fearful of his wrath and dreading his power, sent the panels to Munich.
The woodcut portrait of Dürer, dated 1527, shows the worn face of a man of fifty-six years, whose life has been stormy and sometimes unhappy. It is much less beautiful than the earlier pictures, for his long flowing hair and beard have both been cut short, perhaps on account of sickness, or in deference to the new puritan ideas. The face is delicate and melancholy, and seems to rest under the shadow of approaching death, which is to be met with a calm and simple faith.

His second book, entitled "Some Instruction in the Fortification of Cities, Castles, and Towns," appeared in 1527, and was dedicated to Ferdinand I., and adorned with several woodcuts. In this the artist showed the same familiarity with the principles of defensive works as his great contemporaries Leonardo da Vinci and Michael Angelo had done. Much attention is paid to the proper sheltering of heavy artillery from hostile shot; and the plans of the towers and bastions about Nuremberg, which were built after Dürer's death, were suggested in this work. A large contemporary woodcut by the master shows the siege of a city, with cannon playing from the bastions, and the garrison making a the enemy.

from me! for I know well that but small and mediocre understanding and art can be found in the following work."

The high appreciation in which this book was held appears from the fact that it passed through several German editions, besides three Latin, two Italian, two French; Portuguese, Dutch, and English editions. Most of the original MS. is now in the British Museum.

Among Dürer's other works were treatises on Civic Architecture, Music, the Art of Fencing, Landscape-Painting, Colors, Painting, and the Proportions of the Horse.

But the year 1527 was nearly barren of new art-works; for the master's hand was losing its power, and his busy brain had grown weary. His constitution was slowly yielding before the fatal advances of a wasting disease, possibly the low fever which he had contracted in Zealand, or it may have been an affection of the lungs. In the latter days he made a memorandum: "Regarding the belongings I have amassed by my own handiwork, I have not had a great chance to become rich, and have had plenty of losses; having lent without being repaid, and my workpeople have not reckoned with me; also my agent at Rome died, after using up my property. Half of this loss was thirteen years ago, and I have blamed myself for losses contracted at Venice. Still we have good house-furnishing, clothing, costly things as earthenware [maiolica], professional fittings-up, bed-furnishings, chests, and cabinets; and my stock of colors is worth 100 guldens."

The last design of the master was a drawing on gray paper, showing Christ on the Cross. When this was all completed except the face of the Divine sufferer, the artist was summoned by Death, and ascended to behold in glory the features which he had so often portrayed under the thorns.

A violent attack of his chronic disease prostrated him so far that he was unable to rally; and after a brief illness he passed gently away, on the 6th of April, 1528. It was the anniversary of the day on which Raphael died, eight years before. His friends were startled and grief-stricken at his sudden death, which came so unexpectedly that even Pirkheimer was absent from the city. It was long supposed that he died of the plague, on the evidence of a portrait-drawing of himself, showing him pointing to a discolored plague-spot on his side, and inscribed, "Where my fingers point, there I suffer." It was said that this sketch was for the information of his doctor, who dared not visit the pestilence-stricken sick-chamber. But this hypothesis is no longer considered tenable.

The remains of the master were buried in the lot of his father-in-law, Hans Frey, at the Cemetery of St. John, beyond the walls; and his monument bore Pirkheimer's simple epitaph: "ME. AL. DU. QUICQUID ALBERTI DURERI MORTALE FUIT, SUB HOC CONDITUR TUMULO. EMIGRavit VIII IDUS APRILIS, MDXXVIII. A.D.

On Easter Sunday, 1828, the third centenary of his death, a great procession of artists and scholars from all parts of Germany moved in solemn state from Nuremberg to the grave of Dürer, where they sang hymns.
In the valley of the Pegnitz, where across broad meadowlands Rise the blue Franconian mountains, Nuremberg the ancient stands.

Quaint old town of toil and traffic, quaint old town of art and song, Memories haunt thy pointed gables, like the rooks that round them throng.

Memories of the Middle Ages, when the emperors rough and bold
Had their dwelling in thy castle, time-defying, centuries old;

And thy brave and thrifty burghers boasted, in their uncouth rhyme,
That their great imperial city stretched its hand through every clime.

In the courtyard of the castle, bound with many an iron band,
Stands the mighty linden planted by Queen Cunigunde's hand;

On the square the oriel window, where in old heroic days Sat the poet Melchior singing Kaiser Maximilian's praise.

Everywhere I see around me rise the wondrous world of Art,
Fountains wrought with richest sculpture standing in the common mart;
And above cathedral doorways, saints and bishops carved in stone,
By a former age commissioned as apostles to our own.

In the church of sainted Sebald sleeps enshrined his holy dust,
And in bronze the Twelve Apostles guard from age to age their trust:

In the church of sainted Lawrence stands a pix of sculpture rare,
Like the foamy sheaf of fountains, rising through the painted air.

Here, when Art was still religion, with a simple, reverent heart,
Lived and labored Albrecht Dürer, the Evangelist of Art;

Hence in silence and in sorrow, toiling still with busy hand,
Like an emigrant he wandered, seeking for the Better Land.

Emigravit is the inscription on the tombstone where he lies:
Dead he is not, but departed, for the artist never dies.

Longfellow.
Pirkheimer wrote to Ulrich, "Although I have been often tried by the death of those who were dear to me, I think I have never until now experienced such sorrow as the loss of our dearest and best Dürer has caused me. And truly not without cause; for, of all men who were not bound to me by ties of blood, I loved and esteemed him the most, on account of his countless merits and rare integrity. As I know, my dear Ulrich, that you share my sorrow, I do not hesitate to allow it free course in your presence, so that we may consecrate together a just tribute of tears to our dear friend. He has gone from us, our Albert! Let us weep, my dear Ulrich, over the inexorable fate, the miserable lot of man, and the unfeeling cruelty of death. A noble man is snatched away, whilst so many others, worthless and incapable men, enjoy unclouded happiness, and have their years prolonged beyond the ordinary term of man's life."

Pirkheimer died two years after Dürer's death, and was buried near him. During his last days, and therefore so long after his friend's decease that the first violence of his emotions had fully subsided, and his mind had become calm, he wrote to Herr Tschertte of Vienna, and gave the following arraignment of the widow Dürer: "Truly I lost in Albert the best friend I ever had in the world, and nothing grieves me so much as to think that he died such an unhappy death; for after the providence of God I can ascribe it to no one but his wife, who so gnawed at his heart, and worried him to such a degree, that he departed from this world sooner than he would otherwise have done. He was dried up like a bundle of straw, and never dared to be in good spirits, or to go out into society. For this bad woman was always anxious, although really she had no cause to be; and she urged him on day and night, and forced him to hard work only for this,—that he might earn money, and leave it to her when he died. For she always feared ruin, as she does still, notwithstanding that Albert has left her property worth about six thousand gulden. But nothing ever satisfied her; and in short she alone was the cause of his death. I have often myself expostulated with her about her suspicious, blameworthy conduct, and have warned her, and told her beforehand what the end of it would be; but I have never met with

It is said that Raphael, after studying Dürer's engravings, exclaimed, "Of a truth this man would have surpassed us all if he had had the masterpieces of art constantly before his eyes as we have." Even so at the present day is it seen, that if Dürer had studied classic art, and imbibed its principles, he might have added a rare beauty to the weird ugliness and solemnity of his designs, and substituted the sweet Graces for the grim Walkyrie. Yet in that case the world would have lost the fascinations of the sad and profound Nuremberg pictures, with their terrific realism and fantastic richness.

Italy did not disdain to borrow the ideas of the transalpine artist; and even Raphael took the design of his famous picture of "The Entombment" (Lo Spasimo) from Dürer's picture in "The Great Passion." Titian borrowed from his "Life of the Virgin" the figure of an old woman, which he introduced in his "Presentation in the Temple." The Florentine Pontormo copied a whole landscape from one of Dürer's paintings; and Andrea del Sarto received many direct suggestions from his works.

"It is very surprising in regard to that man, that in a rude and barbarous age he was the first of the Germans who not only arrived at an exact imitation of nature, but has likewise left no second; being so absolute a master of it in all its parts,—in etching, engraving, statuary, architecture, optics, symmetry, and the rest,—that he had no equal except Michael Angelo Buonarotti, his contemporary and rival; and he left behind him such works as were too much for the life of one man."—John Andreas.

In the preface to his Latin translation of "The Four Books of Human Proportion," the Rector Camerarius says: "Nature gave our Albert a form remarkable for proportion and height, and well suited to the beautiful spirit which it held therein; so that in his case she was not unmindful of the harmony which Hippocrates loves to dwell upon, whereby she assigns a grotesque body to the grotesquely-spirited ape, while she enshrines the noble soul in a befitting temple. He had a graceful hand, brilliant eyes, a nose well-formed, such as the Greeks call Τετραγωνον, the neck a little long, chest full, stomach flat, hips well-knit, and legs straight. As to his fingers, you would have said that you never saw any thing more graceful. Such, moreover, was the charm of his language, that listeners were always sorry when he had finished speaking.

“He did not devote himself to the study of literature, though he was in a great measure master of what it conveys, especially of natural science and mathematics. He was well acquainted with the principal facts of these sciences, and could apply them as well as set them forth in words: witness his treatises on geometry, in which there is nothing to be desired that I can find, at least so far as he has undertaken to treat the subject. . . . But Nature had especially designed him for painting, which study he embraced with all his might, and was never tired of considering the works and methods of celebrated painters, and learning from them all that commended itself to him. . . . If he had a fault it was this: that he worked with too untiring industry, and practised a degree of severity towards himself that he often carried beyond bounds.”

There are 261 other wood-engravings described in the catalogue attached to Scott's "Life of Dürer," and ranked as "doubtful." Many of these are held to be authentic by one or more of the three critical authorities on Dürer's works,—Heller, Bartsch, and Passavant. Other connoisseurs, however, ascribe them to different engravers of the early German schools, mostly to pupils and colleagues of Dürer.

PREFACE.

The following pages are devoted to a narrative of the life, character, and productions of the great Rembrandt, the head of the art of Holland, and one of the most original and prolific artists that the world has ever seen. The chief authority in this study is the careful and accurate C. Vosmaer, who for many years past has spared neither pains nor expense in collecting every incident that could develop the story of Rembrandt's artistic traits, or his peculiarities as a man. Vosmaer's first book, treating of the master's precursors and apprenticeship, was published at the Hague in 1863; and his second volume, describing Rembrandt's life and works, appeared in the same city in 1868. He wrote con amore, and exculpated his subject from certain of the false charges which most art-authors have made against him. In several cases Vosmaer conclusively proves his new positions by quoting ancient documents and municipal registries, and renders it easy for the American writer to follow him with confidence.

The other authorities consulted for this biography are Smith's "Catalogue Raisonné" (vol. vii.); Taine's "Art in the Netherlands;" Fromentin's "Les Maîtres d'Autrefois;" Blanc's "Histoire des Peintres;" Coquerel's "Rembrandt et l'Individualism dans l'Art;" Head and Kugler's "Hand-book of Painting;" Middleton's "Notes on Rembrandt;" Blanc's "L'Œuvre Complet de Rembrandt" (two vols.); and the more general treatises of Lübke, Waagen, Baldinucci, and Hamerton. Among other works studied and quoted from, under careful reserve, are Fairholt's "Homes and Haunts of Foreign Artists," and Descamp's "Vie des Peintres" (Marseilles, 1842; vol. i.).

In these comparisons the author has found sufficient reasons to reject the ideas until recently prevalent, that Rembrandt was an avaricious, opinionated, and uncultured peasant. These false beliefs, founded on the statements of the jealous Houbraken, are now discredited by the leading British and Continental critics. It is a happy task to add our testimony towards the vindication of the proudest and loftiest name in the art-history of the Netherlands.

CHAPTER I.

At the dawn of the seventeenth century, the national existence of Holland was being admitted as a new fact, on the map of Europe and in the councils of the Great Powers. The heroic seagirt provinces had waged a desperate war for independence, prolonged through many decades, and accompanied by extraordinary cruelties on the part of the armies of Spain. At last it seemed as if Providence had its eyes upon this little people, favorably examining its griefs and pitying its anguish, and preparing a great deliverance. The nation flourished amid its desolating wars, and grew stronger under attacks which threatened annihilation. It succeeded against the oppressor as it had previously against a brumal climate, an encroaching sea, and the disasters of the drowned lands.

Step by step with the material prosperity and the military and naval prowess of Holland, advanced the more enduring glories of free and fearless literature and art. The revolt of the United Provinces was not only against Spain and Rome, but also against the repression of thought and research in all departments, whereof the political and ecclesiastical formed but a part. Within a few years the enfranchised and illustrious school of Dutch art advanced to a proud position of independence and power, producing dozens of masters whose names can never die. Let us see how fast they followed each other, these giants of the new regime. Wynants was born in 1600; Cuyp in 1605; Rembrandt in 1607; Terburg and Brouwer in 1608; Adrian van Ostade, the Boths, and Ferdinand Bol, in 1610; Gerard Dou and Van der Helst in 1613; Metsu in 1615; Van der Neer at about the same time; Wouverman in 1620; Weenix, Everdingen, and Pynaker in 1621; Berghem in 1624; Paul Potter

Lucas van Leyden was at odds with the conventionalists under Scorel. In the last quarter of the sixteenth century, a group of the most eminent Dutch artists began to appear; and the general level of culture in this direction rose rapidly, while the contest between discipline and individualism went on.

Among the precursors of Rembrandt we find the sincere, serious, and rigid Mierevelt; the brilliant and naturalistic Honthorst, called by the Italians Gherardo della Notte, rich and patrician, and successful alike in England, Italy, and Holland; De Grebber of Haarlem, delighting in highly colored historical pictures; Van Schooten, who echoed the prevalent Italian taste in his religious pictures; Van Ravesteyn, famous for his admirable portraits and corporation-groups; De Keyser, excelling in civic portraits; Jacob Cuyp, full of intense life and character, and leading in the new study and appreciation of out-door nature; with E. Van de Velde, Roghman, and Van Goyen. Leonard Bramer was one of the foremost of the precursors, and anticipated the manner of Rembrandt most nearly, having travelled widely and studied in Italy and France. Uytenbrouck was another contemporary nationalist in art, and executed many delicate and highly finished landscapes and Scriptural scenes.

Elsheimer, the pensive and serious, dwelling in Rome, though of German origin, founded there a new manner of composition, natural, frank, expressive, and picturesque, and exercised a powerful influence over the aesthetic sentiment of his time. Among his many pupils were Lastman, Pinas, Teniers, Goudt, and De Hagelstein; and in his works we may see many intimations of the coming manner of Rembrandt.

Franz Hals was the most brilliant and masterly of the predecessors of Rembrandt, though he was assailed by the denunciations of Houbraken, who was as inaccurate as Vasari, his Italian prototype, and far more harsh. Hals was of a patrician and artistic family of Mechlin, and dwelt at Haarlem nearly all his lifetime. He studied with Van Mander, and afterwards taught the two famous Adrians, Ostade and Brouwer. Without diverting the current of his free and national predilections by studying in Italy, he developed a fresh and brilliant art of his own, full of harmony and dignity, grandeur and unity.
As Vosmaer says, "He was the brilliant introduction, l'allegro vivace con brio, of the majestic Rembrandt symphony."

"Rembrandt van Ryn, the son of Harmen Gerritszoon of the Rhine and Neeltjen Willems of Suydtbrouck, was born in the city of Leyden, July 15, 1606 [1607]. His parents having sent him to school to have him taught the Latin language, and prepared for the Leyden Academy, in order that when he came of age he might serve the city and the republic by his knowledge, he had no longing nor desire thitherward, because his natural tendencies led him always towards the art of painting and designing; wherefore they were obliged to take him away from the school, and place him in apprenticeship with a painter, according to his desire, in order to learn from him the first foundations and principles. Following this resolution, they led him to the meritorious painter Master Jacob Isaakszoon van Swanenburg, to be taught by him, and he remained with him nearly three years; and as during that time he made such progress that the amateurs of art were filled with marvelling, and it was evident that in time he would become an éminence painter, his father found it good to send him away to board, and to conduct him to the renowned artist P. Lastman, living at Amsterdam, in order that by him he should be conducted and taught yet farther and better. Having been there about six months, he thought it best to study and practise painting alone and in his own way; and succeeded so well that he has become one of the most renowned painters of our century. As his art and his work extremely pleased the people of Amsterdam, and as he was many times solicited to make portraits and other paintings there, he found it convenient to move from Leyden to Amsterdam, and went away from here about the year 1630, and abode in that city, and lives there yet in the year 1641.”

In this manner the Burgomaster Orlers, the contemporary of the master, gives a brief account of his beginnings in life, in “The Description and History of the City of Leyden.” Authentic legal documents and inscriptions show that he was born in 1607, instead of 1606. It has been generally supposed, and even Fairholt so stated in his “Homes and Haunts of Foreign Artists” (1871), that Rembrandt was born in a mill, a little way up the Rhine from Leyden; but about the only authority for this belief was the master's etching entitled "The Mill of Rembrandt," whose title was not given, however, until the eighteenth century. Orlers, Van Leeuwen, and other good authorities, state that the great artist was born in Leyden.

The house which was the birthplace of Rembrandt still stands, on a narrow lane diverging from the Noordeinde Street, just inside of the White Gate, and running down between mean houses and barrack-walls to the River Rhine. Early in the sixteenth century, the traveller who entered Leyden from the west followed a road between the Rhine dyke and the low meadows on the left, approaching the quaint Gothic spires and turrets of the city full in front, crossing the broad moat on a wooden bridge, and passing through a low gate between two massive towers. Once within the city wall, and on his left a narrow lane called the Weddesteeg diverged towards the Rhine, running between a range of houses on one side and the rampart on the other. As early as the year of the great Spanish siege, 1574, one of the houses in this outer street was occupied by a miller named Cornelis Claeszoon, with his wife Lysbeth, and her two children by a former marriage, Harmen and Marytje, with their servant and a boarder, a Frisian student. Harmen naturally became a miller, like his stepfather; and Marytje, his sister, married a boatman in 1584, and had four children during the next six years. In 1589 Harmen also appeared in St. Peter's Church, and espoused Neeltje, the daughter of Willem van Suytdbrouck, a baker of Leyden. Soon afterwards he bought half of his stepfather's mill and mill-house, together with a newly-built house in the familiar Weddesteeg, and half of a garden beyond the Rynsburg Gate. His mother died in 1600, and bequeathed her property to him and Marytje; and Cornelis Claeszoon soon remarried, in 1601, his new bride being named Adriaentje Rembrandt’s-Daughter. Harmen was thus frequently brought in contact with the Rembrandts, the family of his stepfather's wife, and became pleasantly familiar with the name which he afterwards bestowed on his son.

At the time of Rembrandt’s birth his father was forty years old, and his mother was a buxom and self-asserting dame of thirty-five. They already had five children, Adriaen, Gerrit, Machteld, Corne-lis, and Willem, and the memories of two who had died. The family was in easy circumstances, owning several houses, a large part of the Rhine Mill, and two suburban gardens. The third house from the north end of the Weddesteeg formed part of Harmen’s heritage from his mother, and he moved into it after Cornelis’s second marriage. In this gable-roofed house, quaint, comfortable, and picturesque, the great Rembrandt was born.

Rembrandt is not a family name, as many have imagined, but a Christian name, analogous to other common first names, such as Wybrand, Garbrand, Sibrand, &c. Certain superficial foreign writers have understood it to be a family title, and have supplied the unnecessary and unauthorized prefix of Paul, which is as if one should say “William Raphael,” or “George Titian.” In those early times the custom was still prevalent in Holland (as it always has been among the Arabs also), of naming children after their parents; so that Rembrandt, the son of Harmen, was called Rembrandt Harmenszoon (Harmen’s son). In the first quarter of the seventeenth century, permanent family names first arose among the Dutch, and were usually formed from their native cities, seigniories, emblems, or localities. In this way arose the title Van Ryn, or "of Rhine," in allusion, probably to the location of the home of Harmen's family.

There is so much talk about "Rembrandt's Mill," although he was neither born in, worked in, nor painted in such a place, that we must at least allude to the actual Van Ryns' mill. That which appears in the engravings of Bisschop, Cornet, and Flameng, was owned in fact by his grandmother, for one year, and stood on the Pelican Bastion of Leyden, over against the White Gate and the Weddesteeg. Having sold it, she bought another at the village of Noordwyck, in 1575, and removed it to a place on the same Pelican Bastion; and this so-called Rhine Mill remained in the possession of the family for three-quarters of a century. Several distinct acts and quota-lists issued officially between 1581 and 1622 show that during all this time Harmen van Ryn lived in the Weddesteeg of Leyden, where he owned a good house. The mill belonging to him was on the bastion opposite; and it is difficult to conjecture why his wife should have left their commodious domicile, at the time of her confinement, to await the coming event among the horrible noises of a windmill.

The mill which the unreliable Houbraken and his copyists have assigned as the birthplace and first studio of Rembrandt was on slightly elevated ground, near the Rhine, and between the hamlets of Layordorp and Koukergen. The inventive writers who assert that Rembrandt was born here, also state that he owed his ideas of concentrated light and general obscurity, to his residence in a mill, where the daylight entered only through a narrow and elevated window. But mills were not used as habitations in those days, especially by well-to-do people like the Van Ryns.

Orlers has told us of the young Rembrandt, rising from the elementary studies, the creeds and secular rudiments, to the dignity of the Latin language, in preparation for a course in the university. His brothers were already engaged in commercial business; but Harmen had evidently resolved that his youngest boy should seek a higher flight, hoping, perhaps, that he might some day attain to the magistracy of the city. But all the efforts of the Dutch Latinist to enlist his pupil's interest in the Augustan literature were in vain; for the miller's son found other and more engrossing themes of interest, in the streets of the proud old town in which he lived.

In those days Leyden was an opulent and powerful city, second only to Amsterdam, filled with the quaint domestic architecture of the Renaissance in Holland, and possessing a sumptuous city-hall and two famous Gothic churches. Only thirty years had passed since its heroic and long-protracted defence against the besieging Spanish army, when it was finally relieved while starving by the Prince of Orange, who broke down the Rhine dykes, and drowned great numbers of the Spaniards. The Prince offered to reward the valiant Leydeners, either by remitting their taxes, or by establishing a university in the city; and they nobly chose the latter. The university afterwards included among its leaders, Scaliger, Gomarus, Arminius, Grotius, Descartes, and Boerhaave; and still has over eight hundred students, with magnificent scientific collections. In the seventeenth century, the city was the home of wealth and comfort, and numbered treble its present population.

Here the vivid imagination of the youth was stimulated by the frequent pompous processions of the veteran civic guards, the brilliant displays of the vain-glorious municipality, and the concourse of strangers from all countries at the annual free markets. These latter began on the anniversary day of the deliverance of the city from the Spaniards, and continued for ten days, while the city was draped with banners, festoons, and flowers. Merry-andrews and musicians paraded the streets, in the midst of groups of foreign merchants, musketeers, citizens, comely Dutch damé, and wide-eyed rustics. The day of military parades was succeeded by that of public games, and that, by the scenes and allegories of the rhetoricians.

At these splendid festivals, the art-loving youth found his highest enjoyment in the city-hall, whose long and ornate facade fronted on Broad Street. In the spacious chambers thereof, he could see not only the pictures by Engelbrechtsen and Lucas van Leyden, owned by the city; but also ever-changing collections of paintings by foreign masters, which were admitted into Leyden only at this time. Furthermore, the hall contained costly articles in gold and silver, jewels, books, and fine cabinet-work, and the choicest goods on exhibition.

Without and beyond the city the sombre seven-

Swanenburg family, whose coat-of-arms was three golden swans on a blue shield; and married a patrician damsel of Leyden, the daughter of Joost Dedel. Of their ten children, three became artists: Claes, who settled at the Hague; William, who excelled in engraving, and was an officer of the civic guard; and Jacob, the eldest, famous only as Rembrandt’s teacher in art. Jacob learned the elementary principles of his profession from his father, and then went to Italy to perfect himself in its higher branches. He spent much of his time at Naples, where he married Margherita Cordona. Afterwards he returned to Leyden with his Italian bride, and took a house in the Broad Street. None of his paintings remain to our day, neither engravings of them, and it is impossible to conjecture what manner of works they were.

Swanenburg had returned from Italy by 1617, and it is probable that Rembrandt entered his studio about the year 1620, a memorable date beyond the Atlantic. During the three years of his sojourn there, the young student learned the art of design and the use of the brush, and the chief technical and material parts of his profession. He was also introduced to the circle of local artists and their studios and discussions, if, indeed, there was any advantage in thus mingling with mediocrity.

Swanenburg was probably chosen by Harmen van Ryn as his son's instructor, partly on account of his illustrious family, his studies in Italy, and his resultant classic ideas. Still he was by no means the best artist in Leyden, and the chief reason of his having been chosen was his kinship with the Van Ryn family.

Many writers suppose that Jan Pinas was one of Rembrandt's instructors, because his brown hues resemble those of the older master, and his choice of subjects was often similar. Pinas studied in Italy, under Elsheimer, and attained the ability of managing strong Caravaggiesque effects of light and shade. But none of the early biographers of Rembrandt mention his connection with this master.

After he had acquired the foundation-principles of his profession, under Swanenburg, the lad was removed from his tuition, and carried to Amsterdam, where he was placed in the studio of Lastman. Pieter Lastman was born about the year 1582, probably in Amsterdam, and received his art-education in the studio of Pieter Gerritszoon, a graduate of Antwerp and of Rome. About the year 1602 he went to Rome, and joined the circle of Dutch artists whereof Elsheimer was the centre, and accepted their manner of design and execution. His works while in Italy were devoid of supernaturalism and conventionalism, and showed forth the sweet and touching southern landscapes of Elsheimer’s new school, with a fair and refreshing human sentiment. Then there ensued a period of less noble work, a state of transition, which was followed by his conscientious adhesion to the new naturalistic school of Caravaggio, whose “swarthy and roasted” manner he transplanted to Holland. After the return to Amsterdam, Lastman married, and settled down to earnest work. His pictures were much sought after, and Vondel called him “the Apelles of the century.” Among Lastman’s scholars were his son Nicholas, Jan Lievens, Roodtsens, and Nedek. Still it is difficult to imagine why Harmen van Ryn selected him as the boy’s teacher, when Mierevelt, Van Ravensteyn, and Hals were at his service.

The dates of the lad’s entrance into Lastman’s studio was 1622 or 1623, when he was about sixteen years old. After a sojourn of only six months, he returned to Leyden and to the paternal fireside, where he remained for seven years. The Van Ryn family was still living in the Weddesteeg lane, and was then composed of the two parents, and their children Gerrit, Machteld, Cornelis, and Lysbeth. Adriaen, the oldest son, after vainly trying his fortune as a shoemaker, had established a mill just across the Rhine from that of his father, near whose house he had his own home. He had married Lysbeth van Leeuwen in 1617, and had three children. Willem van Ryn, another brother, was living with Gerritszoon, the baker, on the Koepoortsgracht.

It is probable that if Rembrandt had wished to journey into Italy, as was the custom with the Dutch art-students of that time, he could easily have obtained the means therefor, from the fortune of his parents. But he seems to have manifested no inclination to travel, or to learn how to reflect the stagnating systems of foreign art-schools; and the thought of the Italian masterpieces of the previous century, or of the rising fame of Rubens, failed to entice him from his home by the walls of Leyden. Did he not feel that in him was to be realized the perfection of Dutch art,—nay, of the art of the future?

He began the close and loving study of Nature—overlooking the Rhine winding among green pastures, while he reclined on the high Pelican Bastion; wandering over the spacious landscapes, banded with silvery canals, which he sought in his suburban rambles; sketching among the outer farms and groves, near the Van Ryn gardens; or scrutinizing the marvellous effects of the sunlight and clouds, the harmony of Nature’s hues, and the transparency of her shadows. Again, he studied men, their physiognomies, traits of countenance, movements, and expressions. His family and his own figure supplied him with models, exhibiting a variety almost infinite. Most of all, he earnestly applied himself to master the relations of light, combining the tentative efforts of his predecessors with the new principles which revealed themselves to him, and with the mysterious and fantastic effects of which he dreamed.

The first work attributed to Rembrandt was executed in 1627, and represents St. Paul in Prison. It is a brightly colored painting, realistic in manner, and shows the influence of Jan Pinas, who, if he was not indeed the teacher of the young artist, was at least carefully studied by him. Rembrandt's first etchings were executed in 1628, and portrayed his mother, a woman of strong character, with contracted eyes and a decided mouth. They were lightly engraved, and showed the power and skill of a practised artist.

In 1628, also, Rembrandt took his first student, a youth of fifteen, by the name of Gerard Dou. He was the son of a Frisian glazier who had married and settled in Leyden; and was apprenticed before to an engraver and to a glass-painter. Dou remained in Rembrandt’s studio for three years, and there laid the foundations of his future greatness.

In 1629 the artist etched his own portrait, showing his bright young face overlooked by masses of bristling blonde hair. During the next few years he repeated this easily accessible subject many times, in a great variety of expressions, thus receiving a valuable practice, and leaving for us a large series of autobiographical engravings.

The first oil-paintings of indubitable authenticity as Rembrandt’s were executed in 1630. One of these, now lost, showed a philosopher in a grotto; the other, in the Cassel Gallery, is the portrait of a lean and white-bearded man, carefully finished, and touched on the face with a magical light. This portrait was the prototype and precursor of a long line of noble likenesses, and showed the confidence and individuality of a skilful colorist.

Already the fame of Rembrandt of the Rhine had spread abroad. He had visited the Hague, and met the connoisseurs of that city successfully. Many times he had been invited to Amsterdam, to execute portraits and other commissions; and in the year 1630 he removed his studio to the great city by the Zuyder Zee, and prepared to place himself at the head of the new school of Dutch art.

zation, cultured, luxurious, and full of political and intellectual activities. The long era of the religious persecution, directed by the Protestant clergy of the dominant sect against all who dissented from their views, had been ended in 1629, when the magistrates freed themselves from ecclesiastical direction. The peace of tolerance settled like a divine blessing over the Netherlands, and was scarcely broken by the ensuing noiseless fusillade of polemical pamphlets, the last shots of the long battle.

The architecture of Amsterdam was quaintly picturesque, charming to an artist's eye, and full of local color. The mariner, approaching from the sea, saw a line of palaces along the quays of the Y, overlooked by scores of dark spires and pinnacles. The rambler in the various streets and along the countless canals continually met with interesting bits of sculpture and house-decoration, marking a new and original style in building. The architects who guided the construction of the city during this period of expansion were Hendrick de Keyser and Danckerts de Ry, who had studied and admired the Italian Renaissance buildings of Scamozzi, the beautifier of Venice; and on this rich style they ingrafted all the grotesqueness and individualism of the Protestant North. The façades of the citizens' houses were incrusted with singular ornaments, Biblical bas-reliefs, medallions, allegories, scripture texts, verses, proverbs, or obscure and ponderous inscribed jokes.

At this time Hendrick de Keyser was already dead, but his three sons were promising painters; and his venerable colleague, Danckerts de Ry, still lived to overlook his art-loving descendants, Danckerts the engravers. Among the chief artists at this time in Amsterdam were the brothers Camp-huysen; Lastman, who had guided Rembrandt in his earlier studies; Pieter Potter, of Enkkuyzen; Aert Pieters, celebrated for portraits; Simon de Vlieger, excelling in landscapes; Emanuel de Witt, young and unruly, but unapproachable in painting superb church interiors; and Torrentius, the painter of the voluptuous, and the hardy opponent of the clergy.

Rembrandt's new studio was on the Bloemgracht, one of the western quays of the city; and here commissions poured in upon him rapidly. Numerous pupils also came; and, in order to accommodate them properly, the master formed several small studios in the hall by erecting partitions.

Roeland Roghman was one of Rembrandt’s nearest and most appreciative friends, and among his most efficient allies. He was some ten years older, of similar tastes in art and peculiarities of character, original, firm, and indefatigable. Throughout their lives these two men were fast friends; Roghman remaining unmarried, unhonored in public life, reproached for his manner in painting, lamenting in his old age that “By the time one begins to know things, he is worn out,” and finally expiring in a hospital, a quarter of a century after his comrade’s death.

Two of Rembrandt’s admiring imitators entered the Guild of Painters in 1630. These were Nicolaes Moyaert, the disciple of Elsheimer, and his pupil Solomon Koninck, the son of a fugitive jeweller of Antwerp. The latter devoted himself to painting portraits and historical subjects, following closely the manner of Rembrandt, and manifesting similar chiaroscuro and coloring. Another young Rembranesque artist, who afterwards wrought out an independent manner, was Jan Lievens, one of the noblest of Holland’s painters.
Jan George van Vliet, the young patrician of Delft, was among the first disciples and friends of Rembrandt, and fully entered into the sentiment of his great works. He reproduced the designs of his young leader in fine and delicate engravings, surprisingly strong in their lights and shades, and full of energetic and picturesque effects. Van Vliet was the first of the long line of engravers who attached themselves to the rising genius, and one of the most sympathetic and successful, in spite of his inaccurate drawing and excessive contrasts.

The two first years, 1630 and 1631, were full of earnest work and unceasing activity, as their productions manifest. Among these were the St. Jerome, now at Aix-la-Chapelle; the lost pictures of Lot and his Daughters, and the Baptism of the Eunuch; and several existing portraits. About forty engravings date from the same period, a score of which are picturesque and skilfully executed studies of old men, beggars, and genre-subjects, while two others portray the Bath of Diana and the Meeting of Danae and Jupiter. Several sketches and designs of this date are also preserved.

Rembrandt has been called "The Prince of Etchers,” and he merits the title by his establishment of a new school of engraving, of the highest excellence. He used not only the etching-needle, but also the dry point; and often employed the graver in finishing. The apparent confusion of lines in his works of this character is made to form surprising and wonderful results, full of indescribable charm, and evincing the profoundest knowledge of the principles of light and shade. All of his engravings were made by the process of etching, of which he gained a perfect mastery. Bartsch, Claussin, Blanc, Smith, and Vosmaer have each given lengthy descriptive catalogues of Rembrandt’s etchings. The most complete collection of these works of art was brought together in London, in 1877, by the Burlington Fine-Arts Club, on which occasion Charles Henry Middleton contributed to “The Academy” a series of scholarly articles, entitled “Notes on Rembrandt.”

In these early years Rembrandt delighted to make etchings of himself, in different positions and with varying expressions. In 1630–1 he reproduced himself in the following ways: Rembrandt with the furred bonnet; making a wry face; with curling hair; with haggard eyes; smiling; with open mouth; with the large nose; with round face; with lifted hair; with round hat; with round furred hat; with squinting eyes; with hanging collar; with unequally furred bonnet; with darkened eyes; with falling bonnet; in griffonements; in an oval border; and in an octagon. His mother was also several times illustrated in the same way, with a variety of millinery.

In his new studio Rembrandt soon finished the beautiful painting of ‘The Presentation in the Temple,’ which is now at the Hague, and is highly prized as his first large work enriched by many figures. Herein he showed his radical divergence from the cold ghastliness of the early Dutch religious paintings, as well as from the mannered idealisms of Italian art, and his earnest search after truth, verisimilitude, and realism. Elsheimer, Pinas, and Lastman had already led the drift of northern art in this direction, substituting the plain practicality of Protestant interpretations for the dubious rhapsodies and ecstasies of the studios of the Latin nations.

The picture presents a great temple-interior, with groups of citizens and prelates, and in the centre, massed under a bright light, the Holy Family, with the richly-robed Simeon adoring the Child Jesus. It is full of the strong shades and contrasting brightness of the new school of art, replete with poetic power and fresh personality, warm in golden lights, and in certain parts showing a rare minuteness of finish in detail. This subject was always a favorite with Rembrandt, and several other paintings thereof are preserved, together with numerous sketches and engravings, showing the venerable Simeon in the Temple at Jerusalem.

The 'Susanna' was executed during the same year, and is now at the Hague. The shrinking naked figure of the fair bather, though lacking in statuesque beauty and symmetry, is thoroughly natural and tender, palpitating with life, and lighted with a warm and harmonious glow. This also was a favorite theme with Rembrandt, and conveniently replaced the Diana and Actaeon of the classical painters with a subject not less alluring, and perhaps more permissible.

To the year 1631 belongs the portrait, now at Brunswick, which is supposed to represent the eminent Hugo Grotius, "a monster of erudition," and a profound writer on law, history, philosophy, and theology—who had been condemned with Olden Barneveldt, and fled to France, but returned to Holland in 1631. Another portrait represented George Ragotski, the Prince of Transylvania, whose domains were ground pitilessly between the upper and nether millstones of Austria and Turkey.

'The School of Anatomy' was executed in 1632, and is one of Rembrandt's most famous paintings. It shows the celebrated Dr. Tulp, dissecting and explaining the structure of the arm of a bare and livid corpse which lies on the table before him, while seven other sagacious and black-cloaked surgeons are listening to his remarks. The scene is in a vaulted hall; and the lecturer appears to be looking out beyond his associates, and addressing an audience not visible. Notwithstanding the strong light on the corpse, skilfully contrasted with the black costumes of the listeners, the attention of the spectator is usually concentrated on the fine portrait-faces of the doctors, full of serious dignity, and minutely finished, with charming color. In 1828 this picture was sold for the benefit of the fund for the surgeons' widows; and the Dutch government gave 32,000 florins for it, transferring it to the Hague Museum.

This was one of the master-works of a class of paintings then popular in the Low Countries, in which the chiefs of the various guilds and corporations were portrayed with minute accuracy and surprising power. Italy had no portraits but those of her dukes and cardinals; and Spain employed Velazquez for four decades in delineating the features of her princes and grandees; but the United Provinces found their highest types of men in the tried and trusty burghers of their cities. The great corporation-pictures included the leaders of the various sections of the body politic, the militia officers, the most eminent merchants and manufacturers, the foremost professional men, the magistrates of the cities, and the elect artisans.

Tulp was celebrated both as a doctor, an anatomist, and a pharmacist, and was professor of anatomy from 1628 to 1653, giving semi-weekly lectures. It is probable that Rembrandt attended these discourses, since he was strongly interested in such subjects; and Tulp is said to have been not only his patron, but his warm friend. He was perhaps led to choose Rembrandt as the painter of his guild, on account of this previous acquaintance with him. The officers of the surgeons' corporation had been admirably portrayed thirty years before, by Aert Pietersen; and later pictures of the same theme had been executed by De Keyser and Elias. The general ordering of the new work, therefore, was suggested and guided by these three preceding ones; though the profound genius which enriched and illuminated the subject was the master's own.

In 1632 Rembrandt also painted the first of several portraits of Lieven Willemszoon van Coppenol, a semi-literary gentleman of Amsterdam who seems to have been fond of seeing pictures of himself, since he patronized several of the resident artists in this way. Coppenol was a skilful penman, as calligraphy went in those days; and his achievements in this direction called forth the tuneful praise of no less than seven Dutch poets, and the homage of numerous artists. He remained for many years a warm personal friend of Rembrandt, who was a few years his junior. The first portrait is now at Cassel, and is an admirable work, full of nature, finished in minute detail, rich in equal lights, and interpenetrated with character. Coppenol is seated in an arm-chair, trimming a quill with a penknife, with both his delicate and adroit hands at breast-height, while he lifts his head from his work, and looks out of the picture.
During the same year Rembrandt executed several other portraits, the best of which was that of Dr. Kalkoen, full of dark, rich colors, and easy in arrangement. Other works of this class represented Martin Looten, the secretary Maurits Huygens, and other officers and gentlemen of Amsterdam. There were also six portraits of ladies, two of which are supposed to have been taken from Saskia Ulenburgh, the Frisian beauty who afterwards won the master's heart, and shared his home.

About the same time Rembrandt illustrated the legends of Europa and Proserpine with brilliant pictures, and executed other paintings of 'Moses Saved from the Nile,' 'Christ and Nicodemus,' and 'St. Anastasius.' The etchings of 1632 were not numerous; but one of them was the celebrated 'Resurrection of Lazarus,' a grandiose and highly expressive composition, in which several innovations were made.

During the negotiations between Belgium and Holland at this time, Rubens spent several days in the latter country; but there is no mention of his having met Rembrandt, although he visited numerous studios. It is astonishing that two such masters, living so near each other, should ship, and turns half-impatiently towards the lady, who is bringing in a note. Other portraits of this year are those of Madame Grotius (so called), at Brunswick; a youth, at Dresden; a richly dressed and energetic young man, in the late Poulter's Collection; and no less than sixteen others, including two of the artist himself.

About this time, also, he introduced a new manner of portrait-painting, startling in its chiaroscuro, with a profound black in the backgrounds, and deep shadows on the faces, except on the cheek, nose, and shoulder, where vivid lights fall. This sensational method was powerfully effective, and was altogether a novelty in northern art. Examples of Rembrandt's work in this vein may be seen in portraits now at Cassel and Gotha, and in Van Vliet's engravings of several lost pictures of the period between 1631 and 1634.

Among the numerous etchings of this year the best was a large reproduction of 'The Descent from the Cross.' This work was exposed for sale, together with 'The Good Samaritan,' a subject which he also reproduced in a small painting, now in Lord Hertford's collection. Four new engravings of the artist's own portrait appeared this year, one of which was the well-known 'Rembrandt with the Bird of Prey.' Another interesting work was an illustration for the poem of 'The Praise of Navigation,' a long and quaint rhymed history by Herckmans, as devoid of rhythm as the choppy waves of the Zuyder Zee, but full of amusing details,—the voyage of Noah, the wars of Germanicus, St. Paul on the Mediterranean, etc. The picture is called 'The Bark of Fortune,' and shows scenes from the life of St. Paul, ending with his shipwreck at Malta. The Acts of the Apostles were evidently followed more carefully than the rugged lines of Herckmans; and the master's intimate acquaintance with the text of the Bible is shown in all the details of his work.

The genius of Rembrandt quickly made itself felt throughout the narrow circle of Lowland art, and conquered all opposition with its combined vigor and delicacy, masterly chiaroscuro, and originality of design. Houbraken, the Dutch Vasari, said that artists who wished to please the public were forced to adopt the new manner; and Dou, Lievens, and Van Vliet closely followed the master's footsteps. Koninck was so impressed with the necessity of close imitation, that he even secured the same models that Rembrandt employed.

Notwithstanding the exhaustive fecundity of the master's brain, and the prodigious number of pictures and engravings issuing from his studio, he found time to impart thorough instruction to several brilliant pupils. One of these was Ferdinand Bol, a native of Dordrecht, who entered the studio about 1630, and acquired the Rembranesque manner so fully, that some of his portraits might pass for works of his great teacher, and were celebrated in Vondel's poetry. He also became eminent as an engraver, following the same efficient guidance. Bol was on intimate social relations with Rembrandt, and painted pleasing portraits of him and of Saskia (now in the Brussels Museum).

Govaert Flinck was another member of the studio-company. He was from Cleves, and had been sent to Amsterdam by his father to learn the details of mercantile life; but felt a strong preference for painting, and neglected the counting-room desk in favor of the easel. His father at last allowed him to enter the studio of Lambert Jacobs, an inferior Frisian painter, which he deserted for that of Rembrandt about the year 1633. He remained several years, dwelling a part of the time at the house of Hendrick Ulenburgh; and became one of the foremost of Dutch historical painters, largely patronized by the magistrates of Amsterdam and Prince Maurice of Orange, and winning high admiration for his skilful groupings and designs, and his pure and chaste coloring. He also made many famous portraits; but it is said by Descamps that he abandoned this field after seeing Van Dyck's masterpieces.

Jacob Backer was another of Lambert Jacobs's pupils who entered Rembrandt's studio. He followed the manner of his master successfully, until the tide of critical favor changed in favor of "the grand style," when he embraced historical and mythological painting on an imposing scale.

Of these three students in the first period of Rembrandt's teaching, Bol was the foremost, excelling in depth, freedom, and spirit. Flinck had a more commanding personal appearance; but his plain and unpolished comrade was richer in naturalness and naiveness of manner.

Two other and earlier pupils of the first period were Jan de Wet and Willem de Poorter. The former was a member of an artistic family, and Rembrandt's favorite subjects in his original manner. Poorter was from Haarlem, and was a feeble designer and a cold colorist.

The heads of Netherland literature at this time were Joost van den Vondel, the lyric poet and dramatist, and Pieter Hooft, the historian and poet. The latter, a fearless and heroic opponent of the intolerant clericals, gathered around himself a group of choice spirits, including the dramatist Coster and the literati Voss, Reael, Starter, and Vechters, whose re-unions occurred frequently in Hooft's rich saloons at Amsterdam, or at his château of Muiden.

Rembrandt had but slight connection with these eminent literati, who were his contemporaries in Amsterdam, and therefore missed the eulogies which they lavished on his brother-artists. But he was on terms of close intimacy with Constantyn Huygens, the scholar and poet, who had befriended him even before he left Leyden. Huygens was the councillor and secretary of the Stadtholder Frederick Henry; and when that prince furnished and decorated the Lowland palaces, on his assumption of the government in 1625, the poet-councillor secured the direction of their art-galleries. He corresponded with many eminent artists, and enriched the Stadtholder’s palaces with portraits, historical scenes, landscapes, and cabinet-pictures, by Rubens, Honthorst, and other Dutch artists, and statuary by Dienssaert.
CHAPTER III.

Vosmaer likens the history of Rembrandt’s life to one of his pictures, — full of vague shadows in the background, but lighted up from time to time by luminous figures. The brightest of these was Saskia van Ulenburgh, who afterwards became the light of the artist’s household, and the fountain of all his domestic joys.

Her father was the jurisconsult, Rombertus Ulenburgh, burgomaster of Leeuwarden, and envoy to the court of William of Orange, a friend of the taciturn prince, and one of the foremost men of Friesland. He had three sons and six daughters, whereof two of the first became barristers, and one entered the army. Five of the daughters were well married, their husbands being Professor Maccovius, Secretary van Loo, Commissary Copal, Doede Ockama, and Wybrand de Geest. The last-

Sylvius, of whom he painted a fine portrait, showing a strong and expressive face, in meditation over an open book. At the same time he executed two portraits of the preacher's cousin Saskia,—fresh, naive, and smiling. In the latter part of the year, this young lady returned to the Frisian town of Franeker, in whose university her sister Antje's husband was a professor. Antje was sick unto death; and, after her demise, the fair guest managed the household of her learned brother-in-law until the next summer, when she went to visit with her sister Hiskia, at St. Annakerck of Bildt.

Saskia was immortalized by the pencil of Rembrandt in many ways, as if he could not too often depict her fresh and beautiful colors, brilliant eyes, and luxuriant hair. As Diana, Delilah, Bathsheba, Titania, a decorous dame of Holland, a loving wife on her husband's knee, or watching him at his labors, Saskia appears in all her beauty, arrayed with the picturesque costumes and jewelry of the studio. After contemplating her features, one can well believe the dry remark of the latest tourists' guide (Baedeker, 1874), that "the Frisian women, especially those of Leeuwarden, enjoy a great reputation for beauty." An enthusiastic Dutch writer says that Saskia was to Rembrandt what Vittoria Colonna was to Michael Angelo, or Monna Lisa to Leonardo da Vinci, or Beatrice to Dante.

In 1633 Rembrandt painted three elaborate portraits of his betrothed, the lovely Saskia. One of these is in the Dresden Museum, and shows her smiling, with parted lips, while she is robed in light-blue damask and adorned with pearls. The portrait in the late Fesch Gallery is of a more pleasing character and more careful execution, displaying the maiden's snowy complexion, great deep eyes, rosy lips, and rich auburn hair, adorned with white and green plumes, and wearing pearls on her neck and a chain of gold on her green silk mantilla. The picture at Cassel shows her fresh, fair face in full light, with a delicate profile and a finely formed nose, while the body is in shadow. The costume is very rich and picturesque, pearl-strewn as a sultan's robe; and the finish of the painting is at once powerful and minute. This portrait was probably made for the lady herself, or for her family, and bears evidence that the artist knew that its future owners would appreciate a microscopically minute work better than one of more breadth and brusqueness.
The Teyler Museum, at Haarlem, contains two beautiful India-ink sketches on blue paper, representing young Rembrandt, with his meagre moustache, and his pretty blonde bride, full and plump of face, and sparkling-eyed. A delicious sketch in the Berlin Museum reveals Saskia once more, accompanied with the puzzling inscription: “This is the portrait of my wife (huysvrouwe), made when she was twenty-one years old, the third day of our marriage, June 8, 1633.” The date seems to be a year wrong.

Perhaps it is as well that the Dutch biographer, after noting certain facts about the Ulenburgh family, and showing how our artist might naturally have known them socially, proceeds, with simple directness, to copy the official registry of marriages in 1634: “Rembrandt Harmens van Ryn, of Leyden, twenty-six years of age, dwelling in the Breedstraat, whose mother will consent, appeared before the commissaries, and also Saskia van Ulenburgh, of Leeuwarden, dwelling in Bildt at St. Annakerck, for whom has appeared Jan Cornelis [Sylvius], preacher, as cousin of the said Saskia, preparing himself to furnish the legal inscription of the said Saskia, before the third publication.”
The young artist now laid aside his pencils for a time, in favor of more fascinating employment. Hurrying to Leyden, he secured his mother’s consent to the nuptials, drawn up in full form by a skilful notary. Then he sped away northward, across the Zuyder Zee, to Friesland, whose rich pastures and blue lakes, far below sea-level, stretched around the house of the beloved Saskia. Late in June the marriage was contracted in the town-hall of Bildt, and then solemnized in the Church of St. Anna. Gerrit van Loo, the secretary of the commune, was the brother-in-law of the bride; and we can well believe that the ceremonies were worthy of the old Friesland fame.

The young couple soon returned from Friesland to Amsterdam, and settled in the house which Rembrandt had previously occupied. This home was in the spacious and airy Breedstraat, one of the most modern streets of the expanding city; and was near the house of the artist Lastman.

Saskia was but twenty-one years of age when she was married. The question still remains unanswered, why this young, beautiful, and aristocratic lady gave herself to a poor artist of ordinary family, lacking in physical attractiveness and in polished manners. She brought him not only an honorable alliance with an illustrious house, but also a handsome fortune, calculated to ease his way for many years.

But the year 1634 was not altogether devoted to wedding journeys and bridal junketings; for a goodly number of valuable pictures are marked with that date. Besides the Madrid 'Artemis,' there were 'The Repentance of St. Peter,' 'The Incredulity of St. Thomas' (now at St. Petersburg), 'Judas and the Blood-Money,' and 'The Large Descent from the Cross.' The latter was perhaps the same that hung in Rembrandt's house, and afterwards passed into the galleries at Malmaison, Cassel, and St. Petersburg. It is a profound and realistic design, illuminated by powerful and unusual coloring,—showing a night-scene lit up by torches.

The portraits of this year are worthy of special notice; and foremost among them are three of full length and life size. Martin Day, a Dutch officer of English origin, and a veteran of the campaigns in Brazil, is commemorated by a living and speaking portrait, richly colored, and calmly and delicately finished in all its parts. Another full-length represents the Rev. Mr. Ellison, of the English Church at Amsterdam, — a stately and gray-bearded gentleman, sitting in a leather chair in his library. The companion-picture shows the aged Mrs. Ellison, robed in black, and wearing a quaint broad hat. These two, after sojourning for over two centuries in English rectories and country-seats, were sold in London in 1860, for about $9,000, and afterwards entered the Schneider Collection at Paris.

Another calmly-conceived and carefully-wrought portrait represents the blacksmith-poet Jan Hermans Krul, the author of "The World in Paper" (Pampiere Wereld), which was illustrated by one of Rembrandt's followers. Still others portrayed Dr. Tulp and his wife (a venerable dame of 83 years); a lady shepherdess; and Admiral van Dorp. The latter was a brother-in-law of Constantyn Huygens, the poet; and by his introduction the intimacy between the artist and Huygens was probably inaugurated.

The portraits which Rembrandt made of himself at this time are prepared with more freedom and variety than the preceding pictures, in whose execution he was probably trammelled by the directions of the subjects. The one now at Cassel displays an energetic face under a plumed casque, with mellow shades and a firm touch. The Berlin examples are richly clad and carefully elaborated; that at the Hague shows him as a military officer, with remarkable effects of light and shade; the Pitti-Palace example is chiefly notable for the absence of a beard; and that in the Louvre but slightly resembles the artist. These frequent repetitions of his own features were not due to any personal vanity on the part of the master, but served as so many studies of new modes of arrangement and shading. He was restrained from such experimental work on the portraits of his patrons, and therefore made scores of tentative studies from his own face.

The new engraving of Saskia shows that favorite lady with her long hair banded with three lines of pearls, while her figure is assuming a matronly embonpoint. Another, of about this time, contains Saskia and two other ladies, drawn with the utmost delicacy and vividness. Still another, called 'The large Jewish Wife,' develops the same familiar features and customary pearls, the lady being covered with a dressing-robe, and seated in an arm-chair who expresses his terror in various and novel ways. This honest and practical Dutch version of the ancient myth, devoid of conventional forms and opposed to the Italian ideas, has failed to be comprehended by many critics, who have affected to consider it a parody. The general tone of the picture is olive-green; and the principal figures are executed with striking fidelity and strong character.

The portraits of the year included the artist himself, a coldly executed work; Saskia, the joyous beauty, in two pictures representing her as a Jewish bride; a cuirassed officer with his hand upon his sword-hilt; two busts of old men; and a young lady, black-robed and adorned with pearls.

In the same year the master made a superb etching of the aged Johannes Uyttenboogaert, which was accompanied by a set of Latin verses from the pen of Grotius. The subject aforenamed was a friend of the artist, eminent in theology, and an active leader of the Remonstrants, after whose defeat he was banished, and remained in exile, with Grotius and Episcopius, until the accession of Prince Frederick Henry. Other etchings were those of the three heads of Asiatics, which certain connoisseurs think were only retouched by Rembrandt; several busts of old men; Christ and the Tribute-Money; and the Crucifixion.

De Piles asserts that Rembrandt visited Venice in 1635; but Descamps says that this idea arose from the fact that he put the name of Venice on several etchings, so that they might bring better prices. The same French critic adds that the master continually threatened to remove to England, Sweden, Germany, or France, in order to cause his works to bring higher prices at home; though he never left Amsterdam after he had once settled there. The demonstrable inaccuracy of the latter statement may well make us somewhat doubtful of the former, as well as of all others of the superficial and sciolistic Parisian biographer. Equally unlikely is the story that Rembrandt at one time secreted himself for a long period, and caused his family to give out that he was dead, in order to increase the popular estimation and the price of his works.

The designs of Rembrandt, though lacking the minute finish of modern aquarelles, are full of interest and charm. They were studies from nature, genre-sketches, the first draughts of subsequently elaborated ideas, quickly and nervously blocked out with pencil, crayon, or other material, and intended for the artist’s eye alone. Two of the most interesting of these are at Amsterdam and Berlin, and are adaptations of the famous Italian painting of ‘The Last Supper,’ — ‘Da Vinci translated into Rembrandt.’

In 1635 and 1636 the master portrayed three scenes from the history of Tobias. The first is now in the Berlin Museum, and shows the blind father awaiting his son’s return; and the second, in the same collection, contains Tobias and his wife, seated in a chamber. The third is in the Berlin Museum, and illustrates the scene of Tobias restoring sight to his father. It is a finely elaborated and harmonious work, rich in delicate gray and brown tints, and striking in its chiaroscuro. In 1637 this favorite subject is again brought forth, in two pictures of the angel and the family of Tobias, one of which is in the Louvre, and the other is in the Wombwell Collection. The Louvre picture is a reproduction of Martin van Heemskerk’s engraving of the same scene, enriched by warm and brilliant coloring. The original design in India ink is at the Dresden Museum.
Vosmaer points out the fact that the now almost-forgotten Apocryphal Book of Tobias was a great favorite in the studios of the seventeenth century, before which its rich artistic capabilities were unknown. "In the Middle Ages they painted above all that which the Bible contained of the frightful and terrible, the apocalyptic side; in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the Passion and the legends of the saints, the epic and heroic sides; in the seventeenth century, the Gospels, Tobias, etc., the humanistic and human side." Dou, Flinck, and other Dutch masters, illustrated the life of Tobias; and Rembrandt treated it in several paintings, designs, and etchings, besides those enumerated above.

In 1636 Rembrandt changed his residence to a house in the Nieuwe-Doele Street of Amsterdam. He was now busily engaged on three Passion-pictures,—'The Entombment,' 'The Resurrection,' and 'The Ascension,'—companions to the Crucifixion scenes, painted for Prince Frederick Henry four years before, and intended for the same destination. These new pictures were finished with great and loving care, and were perfectly satisfactory to the artist himself.

riage. It appears that Petrus Sylvius, the nephew of Rembrandt, was not satisfied with his dignities as pastor of Slooten, in Friesland, but aspired to the nominal headship of a family; and to compass this end he espoused Sibilla Dilburgh.

Since the death of Rembrandt's father, in 1632, his mother had lived alone with her youngest daughter, Lysbeth. Of her once pleasant company of children, Gerrit, Machteld, and Cornelis were dead; and Adriaen still tended his mill on the slow-moving Rhine, near the old home. One more brother remained, the doughty Willem, baker at Leyden, who abode in one of his mother's snug houses on the Rhine. In June of 1636 he married Willemgen, the widow of Jacob Symons van Leen-wen, and settled his ways in life.
CHAPTER IV.

Rembrandt’s life was now full of industry, and whoever wished to secure his work must needs pay well for it. He was restrained from attending the merry symposia of his easy-going brother-artists, both by his own simple tastes and by the requirements of his domestic establishment. A few earnest friends of kindred spirit were enough for him; and for the rest he spent many hours in rambling about amphibious Amsterdam, finding themes for sketches. His ruling mania was that of the bric-à-brac hunter; and he made frequent visits to the markets, the foreign ships, and the antiquarians, seeking for quaint furniture, weapons, costumes, and rare draperies. The collections which he made were worthy of a continental fame; and included also hundreds of pictures and engravings, which he bought at the public sales.
The full record of Rembrandt’s activity cannot be set forth without alluding frequently to the pupils whom he imbued with his great ideas, and guided into the upward paths. After Flinck and Backer had left his studio, three new aspirants, Victor, Eeckhout, and Koninck, took their places between 1635 and 1640. Jan Victor was a talented student, who drank freely from the Rembranesque source, and acquired a wide versatility and a grand and vigorous manner, howbeit lacking in delicacy and transparency. Several of his pictures are direct reflections of his master’s works; and he painted not only ‘The Girl at the Window,’ and ‘Isaac Blessing Jacob,’ — the stock subjects of all the pupils, — but also the favorite Biblical themes of Tobias and Samson.

Gerbrand van den Eeckhout was first the pupil and afterwards the friend of Rembrandt. He was more successful in small pictures, full of sentiment and picturesque beauty, reflecting the manner and even the favorite subjects of the master, but enriched by the thoughts of his own free mind. Eeckhout was also a skilful and prolific designer, and made numerous etchings.

Philip Koninck was another member of the studio-family at this time, and developed a remarkable aptitude for landscape-painting, as well as for portraits and figures. His ‘Sleeping Venus’ called forth the poetic eulogies of the tuneful Vondel, whom the gratified artist afterwards portrayed several times with great skill. But it was through the merit of his glorious landscapes that he won a place in the great school of the seventeenth century. In 1656 he married Margareta van Ryn, who was a namesake and perhaps a kinswoman of his old master.

The first landscape was produced at this time, and is now at Cassel. It is only a study, but it is a delicious one, representing a Dutch winter-scene, with an ice-bound canal under a greenish-blue sky, groups of merry skaters, and a prosperous rural settlement in the background.

In 1636 the picture of ‘Samson Blinded by the Philistines’ was finished, showing the Hebrew hero prostrate under his enemies, with Delilah in flight. It is not one of the master’s best works, and its authenticity has been freely doubted. A grander conception was the etching of the ‘Ecce Homo,’ a masterly composition, crowded with figures, and finished with affluent resources of invention. It is filled with dramatic fire, and contains some rare and expressive faces. Other etchings of this date represented 'The Prodigal Son,' 'Jesus and the Doctors,' and several quaint Dutch landscapes.

The beautiful portraits of Saskia, engraved in 1636, show the fine oval face, blue eyes, and pouting lips of the young housewife, who evidently still remains in good health and genial temper. In one of them she appears seated at a table face to face with her husband, as if in the domestic circle at evening.

One of the noble paintings which have disappeared from view, and are remembered only by engravings, is that representing a lady and gentleman, in a beautiful landscape, walking hand in hand. Their air and their costumes are both princely; and the background of rocks, woods, and falling waters, is executed with rare skill and attractiveness. Possibly these happy ramblers represented Rembrandt and his Saskia.

The productions of 1637 were four religious pictures, six portraits, and four etchings. Two of the first-named were from the life of Tobias, and a third delineated 'A Hermit in Prayer.' 'The Lord of the Vineyard’ was painted in 1637, and is now at the Hermitage Palace. It represents him as seated in a chamber which is flooded with golden light, listening to the complaints of his laborers. Three of the six portraits of this year were likenesses of the artist himself; another was that of a white-bearded burgomaster; and still another, “of an admirable beauty,” was the head of an old woman.

In July, 1638, a daughter was born to Saskia, and was named Cornelia, after the mother of Rembrandt. The clergyman who baptized the child was the venerable Sylvius; and the witness was Titia, sister of Saskia, and wife of Copal, the dweller in sea-girt Flushing. But grief came full soon to the painter’s home, for in less than four weeks little Cornelia died, and was buried in the Zuyder Kerk. Three months later, and Sylvius, the saintly old pastor, passed also to his reward.

The annals of the Frisian law-courts for 1638 give the details of several suits in which Rembrandt fought for the rights of his wife. In the first, he and his brothers-in-law successfully sued Dr. van Loo for the payments on a domain called Ulenburgh’s Staele, one of the former appanages of the Ulenburgh estate. Two months later, the same plaintiffs brought action against the non-paying tenants of another of the Ulenburgh farms. The litigious and fault-finding spirit which was raised in the family by these contests seems to have been prolonged into personal recriminations; for Rembrandt soon afterwards sued certain of his kinsfolk for slander, demanding the payment of damages. He says “that he and his wife are richly and ex suprabaundanti provided with goods (for which they can never be thankful enough to the Almighty); yet, notwithstanding that, the defendants insinuate that his wife Saskia has squandered her heritage in ornaments and ostentation.” The alleged calumniators denied that their ill-tempered remarks applied to the painter and his wife; and the court dismissed the suit. Probably Saskia’s rural kinspeople, simple and unostentatious souls, inferred an amazing extravagance from the priceless jewels with which she was adorned in her portraits, being unaware that these decorations were but an artistic trick, and that the royal necklaces and bracelets existed only in the master’s imagination.

The great picture of ‘The Feast of Ahasuerus,’ or ‘The Wedding of Samson,’ was executed

Catherine and her wheel of martyrdom. The features, hair, and pearls are those of Saskia. A new painting of the same year, now at Dresden, shows Rembrandt holding his wife on his knee, while both are smiling, and he lifts up a glass of foaming wine. The figures are of life-size, richly clad, with greenish shadows. The Dresden Gallery contains another fine painting of this period, with the favorite background of olive-green, and a deep, misty coloring. It represents a huntsman uplifting a pheasant,—the first being in the shadow, while the bird is in full light, and is worthy of Weenix himself.

In 1638 Govaert Flinck painted a picture of 'Isaac's Benediction,' in Rembrandt's manner, and signed it with his own name, thus formally indicating the fact that he had ceased to be a pupil, and was now a master. The same subject had been given by Rembrandt to his other pupils, Lievens, Eeckhout, Bol, and Aert de Gelder. This custom of the studio, in giving the same theme to several young students in succession, was carried out in most other cases, under the master's direction. Among these favorite test-subjects were Tobias, the studious philosopher, the call of Matthew, and the girl at a window.
Between 1635 and 1839, Rembrandt executed more than a score of portraits,—admirable works, full of expression and just physiognomy. The silvery tone and equal light of his earlier works in this department are replaced by novel and striking effects of chiaroscuro, and vivid lights flashing on illuminated heads. One of the noblest of these pictures represents a blonde-haired and fresh-visaged gentleman, in life-size; and is incorrectly called a likeness of Jan Six. It is now preserved in the Cassel Gallery, in a room containing three other superb life-sized portraits,—the Marquis del Guasto, by Titian, clad throughout in red; a gentleman, by Van Dyck, in a violet-colored costume embroidered with gold; and a stately personage by Rubens, arrayed in a violet suit with fur trimmings. Rembrandt's picture is worthy of its noble companions, and does not suffer by the inevitable comparison.

Other portraits executed by Rembrandt in 1639 show his mother, in a half-length and life-sized picture; the artist himself; a middle-aged lady in a black bonnet; and a gray-bearded old gentleman. Rembrandt produced four religious paintings, five portraits, and seven etchings, in 1639. Among the former was 'The Two Brothers of Joseph Showing his Bloody Coat to their Father,' a graceful composition, in which little Benjamin is depicted as playing with a bird.

At this time also, Rembrandt finished 'The Entombment' and 'The Resurrection,' which he had begun three years before, at the order of the Stadtholder. In the letter to Huygens, announcing the completion of the work, the complacent artist said, "These two pieces are now finished with much of study and of zeal; . . . because it is in these that I have taken care to express the utmost of naturalness and action; and this is the principal reason why I have been occupied so long on them." In recognition of Huygens's services towards him, the master sent him also a small cabinet-picture as a memento, overruling the conscientious scruples of the sensitive poet. Early in 1639 the larger works were sent to the Stadtholder, with a bill of 1,000 florins each; but Frederick William demurred at this price, and the artist consented to take 600 florins apiece. He asked for immediate payment, but was obliged to await the leisure of others. Six letters which Rembrandt sent to Huygens concerning this group of paintings are still preserved, and are very interesting as showing the character of the writer, his respectful independence, frankness and generosity, lack of pretentiousness, and his intimate relations with Huygens. They also prove, in their courteous and gentlemanly tone, that he was not an enriched peasant, as some have claimed, but a refined and polished correspondent, full of tact and sensibility.

The pictures from the life of Christ, which Rembrandt painted for the Stadtholder, are now in the Munich Pinakothek. They were carefully wrought out with prolonged labor and study, and were filled with alternating deep tones and transparent half-shadows. In his letters he recommended that they should be hung in a strong light, and at a distance from the eye. He said, "A picture is not made to be smelt of: the odor of the colors is unhealthy."

'The Death of the Virgin' was the subject of a noble etching made at this time, grandiose in its conception, and yet filled with beauty and tenderness. Contemporary etchings show 'The Presentation,' 'Youth Surprised by Death,' and the frequently-copied portrait of the master himself. Another represented the Receiver of the States of Holland, Uyttenboogaert, as a gold-weigher, surrounded by bags of treasure. The gentleman was a personal friend of the artist's, and had made him large official payments.

At midsummer of 1640 Saskia gave birth to another child, which was also named Cornelia, and died, like its predecessor, within a few months. In the succeeding September, Rembrandt's mother died, at Leyden, having reached her seventieth year. She bequeathed to her four surviving children, Adriaen, Rembrandt, Willem, and Lysbeth, a considerable property, including seven houses, half a mill, and a garden. The family furniture and effects were divided by lot; and the painter received a bond for half of the mill, whence he might draw a small annual income. But with seeming improvidence he hastened to compound this revenue for a sum of ready money, being now, as always, in need of cash in hand, notwithstanding Saskia's fortune and his own large receipts.

The incessant activity of Rembrandt, as displayed in the three directions of portraiture, small cabinet-pictures, and larger historical compositions, was attended with a continual increase of power and depth of conception. In the three years from 1640 to 1643 he executed several incomparable portraits, full of poetic spirit, grandiose conception, and individual impression. 'The Gilder' is one of the most brilliant and splendid of these works, and was painted in 1640. To illustrate the steady increase in the value of the master's works, this one may be specified as an example, since in 1802 it was sold for $1,000, and in 1865 for over $30,000. One of the most brilliant sketches of this period shows the ramparts of Amsterdam, depicted in lively and harmonious colors. Two portraits of Rembrandt himself date from 1640, with others of a philosopher, a young girl, and an aged dame,—the latter of which was purchased for the Narishkin Collection in 1868, for $11,000. Several designs were elaborated at the same time, and a large group of etchings.

'The Carpenter's Household' is a delightful little cabinet-picture, now in the Louvre, showing St. Joseph at work with his carpentering, in a warmly lighted Dutch apartment full of Ostade-like details, while Mary is near by, nursing the Child Jesus. She has none of the grandeur of the epic Madonnas of Italy, but is a beautiful representation of a tender mother, full of naturalness and homely charm. Another similar work is in the Cassel Gallery. ‘The Salutation,’ in the Grosvenor Gallery, is a contemporary work of the same spirit, with the meeting of Mary and Elizabeth transpiring under a palace-portico, in the presence of other figures. The weird and mysterious ‘Witch of Endor’ bears about the same date.

The next year witnessed the production of the magnificent portraits of ‘The Woman with the Fan’ and her husband, the former of which now adorns Buckingham Palace, and the latter is at the Brussels Museum. They are both of life-size and half-length, and represent their comely and well-to-do subjects with rare strength, delicacy, and expression. Another portrait of this time showed Cornelis Claeszoon Anslo and a lady, seated at a book-laden table. The same gentleman, a Mennonite minister of Amsterdam, and possibly a kinsman of the master, was also represented in several sketches and an etching. Still more charming was the new life-sized portrait of Saskia, with her fair northern beauty, golden-haired and blue-eyed, illuminated by the blending lights of love and art. It is full of life and health, carefully finished, ravishing in its sweet expression, and filled with delicate amaranthine harmony. Four other portraits date from

In September, Saskia gave birth to a child, which was baptized in the Zuyder Kerk soon after. It was named Titus in memory of Titia van Ulenburgh, who died during the same year.

Two exquisite portraits of ladies, now at Berlin and Cassel, date from 1642, a time to which the Munich catalogue refers also the portraits of Govaert Flinck and his wife (though Flinck was not married until some years later). These great works illustrate and confirm the ancient statement that the master often devoted many hours, and even days, to arranging the folds of a turban or the draping of a robe, producing a rare refinement of grace and richness. Five other portraits of ladies, and one of the master himself, date from this year, together with several designs and nine etchings. A small and neatly finished painting delineates the meeting of Jacob and Esau, who are embracing each other, in a high and mountainous landscape.

The portrait of Saskia, painted this year, has a tender and mournful interest, and contrasts in a marked manner with the bright and full-lived portrait of the previous year. She is richly robed and jewelled, as usual, but her face has a delicate and dreamy air, full of melancholy interest and the serene beauty of an artistic transfiguration. The Dresden likeness of 1641 was as the rich and vivid noonday; its successor was the calm and contemplative sunset, when the night cometh on apace.
CHAPTER V.

In 1642 the master finished his great and ever-famous picture of "The Night Watch," or "The Sortie of the Company of Frans Banning Cock," which is now in the Amsterdam Museum. The scene is laid in front of a large public building, whence twenty-nine civic guardsmen and others are issuing, forming a triangular group whose base rests on the background, while its apex is in the extreme foreground, and contains the commanders of the company. The line running to the right is composed of pikemen, a sergeant, fusileer, and drummer; on the left are two young girls, a youth, and several rugged arquebusiers; and between these are other martial figures, with the great standard of the peaceful city. The names and ranks of the sixteen most prominent guardsmen are painted on the picture; and the portrait character of their faces is Frans Banning Cock,’ a fact which becomes evident when it is seen that there is no “watch” in the picture, and that the scene is not at night. Blanc says: “To tell the truth, this is only a dream of night, and no one can decide what the light is that falls on the groups of figures. It is neither the light of the sun nor of the moon, nor does it come from torches: it is rather the light from the genius of Rembrandt.” The picture remained in the armory of the company for about threescore years, and then for a century in the city-hall, whence it was transferred to its present resting-place in the Amsterdam Museum. Van Dyck restored and cleansed the whole work at one time; but time and the varnishers have darkened its tints to the semblance of night.

In departing from the usual manner of corporation-pictures, in which the portrayed functionaries were drawn up in rigid lines and under an equal light, Rembrandt insured for his new and noble work an abundance of life, animation, and movement, and therein consists the secret of its unfading fame. Instead of a series of burgher-portraits, he made a luminous and imaginative picture; instead of a cold chronicle, he gave us a dramatic chapter.
It has been said that Rembrandt could not design; but the masterly arrangement of these stiff citizens-soldiers is enough of itself to disprove such an assertion. Nothing could be more picturesque than the strange mixture of costumes and weapons therein, and the wide liberty of action among the members of this primitive national guard. They are of the frank and homely heroes of the people, who saved Holland from the terrible Spanish infantry by their simple and splendid valor. Montégut says of this picture: "It is liberty in her golden age. . . . It will preserve the memory of Dutch liberty, perhaps even beyond the existence of Holland."

The Broad Street of St. Anthony was at the eastern part of the city, in a suburb then recently annexed, and ran from the picturesque mediæval Gate of St. Anthony with its five round towers out towards one of the main canals. The Gate still stands, and marks the outgoing of the street in which Rembrandt lived at the time of his marriage.

In these latter years Rembrandt moved from his house in the Broad Street of St. Anthony to another on the quays of the River Amstel, where he was dwelling in 1639. Soon afterwards he occupied new quarters in the Broad Street of the Jews, a continuation of St. Anthony's Broad Street, where he bought a spacious house of brick and cut stone, four stories high and four windows wide, built in 1606 in the prevalent Renaissance architecture. The house still stands; and by the aid of an existing legal inventory (dated 1656) we can even refurnish it as it was in the days of Rembrandt. Entering the vestibule we find the flagstone paving covered with fir-wood, with black-cushioned Spanish chairs for those who wait, and to amuse their leisure several busts and twenty-four paintings,—four each by Brouwer and Lievens, the rest mostly by Rembrandt. The antechamber, or saloon, was a large room, furnished with seven Spanish chairs upholstered in green velvet, a great walnut table covered with Tournay cloth, an ebony-framed mirror, and a marble wine-cooler. The walls were covered with thirty-nine pictures, many of which were in massive and elegant frames. There were religious scenes, landscapes, architectural sketches,—works of Pinas, Brouwer, Lucas van Leyden, and other Dutch masters; sixteen pictures by Rembrandt; and costly paintings by Palma Vecchio, Bassano, and Raphael. The next room was a perfect little museum of art, containing a profusion of the master’s pictures, with rare works of Van Leyden, Van Dyck, Aartgen, Parsellis, Seghers, and copies from Annibale Caracci. The oaken press and other furnishings indicated that the marvellous etchings of our artist were engraved and printed here. The next saloon was the gem of the establishment, and was equipped with a great mirror, an oaken table with an embroidered cloth, six chairs with blue coverings, a bed with blue hangings, a cedar-wood wardrobe, and a closet of the same wood. The walls even here showed the profound artistic taste of the occupant, for they were overlaid with twenty-three pictures by Aartgen, Lievens, Seghers, and other northern painters; the Concorde, Resurrection, and Ecce Homo of Rembrandt; a Madonna by Raphael; and Giorgione’s great picture of ‘The Samaritan.’

On the next floor the master had his studios and museum. The great art-chamber contained materials for weeks of study; the walls were covered with rich and costly bric-à-brac—statuettes in marble, porcelain, and plaster; the Roman emperors; busts of Homer, Aristotle, and Socrates; Chinese and Japanese porcelains and drawings; Venetian glass; casts from nature; curious weapons and armor, with a shield attributed to Quentin Massys; minerals, plants, stuffed birds, and shells; rare fans, globes, and books. Another feature was a noble collection of designs, studies, and engravings, filling sixty leather portfolios, and including specimens of the best works of the chief Italian, German, and Dutch artists and engravers. In a small room adjacent were sixteen paintings by Rembrandt, Brouwer, Hals, Aartgen, and Seghers, with casts by Van Vianen, and four chairs with black leather seats. The greater studio enshrined a piece of Michael Angelo’s sculpture, and was decorated with outlandish East-Indian arms and costumes. Its vestibule was adorned with lion-skins; and ten paintings were hung in an adjacent cabinet. The other studio was divided into five compartments, filled with antique arms, Indian, Batavian, and Turkish weapons, sixty pieces of Oriental armor, a collection of pipes, a cannon, Asiatic musical instruments, casts from nature, piles of drapery, and costumes of ancient and curious fabric and finish, and reproductions of antique statuary in plaster, including the Laocoon. The house was filled with the collections of a virtuoso, added to the varied paraphernalia of an historical painter’s studio.
We have seen that the chief masters of European art were represented by their works in this wonderful home-museum, and were fervently admired and studied by their great compeer. And yet it has long been the fashion to decry Rembrandt as a whimsical original, careless of his predecessors in the world of art, if not even scorning their productions. The amassment of such collections as he possessed was the result of long-continued searching and lavish expenditure on all sides. The mere matter of price never stood between him and a desired art-treasure, for he was as liberal as his means allowed in such acquisitions. Hoogstraten tells of his paying eighty rix-dollars for a single engraving of Lucas van Leyden's; and Sandrart says that he once gave 1,400 florins for fourteen proofs from the same master. No wonder, then, that he was oftentimes pressed for money, and that he hastened to compound outstanding assets at a discount for ready cash. His location in one of the chief commercial cities of the world gave him excellent facilities for collecting rare and curious articles. The shipping in the port bore in all manner of strange objects, from the remotest East and the farthest West,—aboriginal trinkets and singular...
natural productions from Java and the Philippines, ivory and precious goods from the Gold Coast of Africa, and barbaric weapons and robes from New Amsterdam and the red tribes of Hudson’s River. Round about the master’s house stretched the high-gabled houses of the Jewish quarter, with their quaint perrons and pent-houses, filled to overflowing with industrious and adventurous Hebrews, and rich in ancient bric-à-brac and far-fetched objects of vertu.

The life of Rembrandt’s household in these days was of perfect simplicity, sober and regular, filled with labor and success, happiness and conjugal devotion. The domestic headquarters was the blue room, where the family gathered at evening, while the candle-light was shed dimly over the pictures and busts and heavy furniture, and was concentrated with a powerful Rembranesque effect on the principal personages. Saskia was usually at the great table, busy with her sewing, or caring for her infant; and Rembrandt sat by her, lightly sketching or touching up his etchings — while their friends engaged in lively conversation around them.

Among the frequent and friendly visitors at the house were the receiver Uyttenboogaert, the art-in richly costumed figures and portraits, showing careful and plodding study. He also acquired the art of etching, and executed several notable works of this kind. Drost was still another and a more eminent student, who afterwards lived and labored in Italy with a few of his compatriots. He was one of the noblest of Rembrandt's art-children, and preserved some of the high traditions of the studio in all their power and richness. Several brilliant pictures by this master are still retained in the European galleries, 'The Continence of Scipio' and the 'Herodias' being foremost among them. Carel Fabritius entered the studio in 1640, in his seventeenth year, and was one of its most manly and vigorous graduates. He was a citizen of Delft, where he was killed in the great magazine explosion of 1654, having previously won a wide fame for his accurate drawing, insomuch that the term "Fabritian perspectives" was synonymous with excellence in that department. Bernard Fabritius was another eminent painter in the manner of Rembrandt, and, if not a pupil, was at least an enthusiastic follower of the great Hollander.

Samuel van Hoogstraten was a fellow-disciple with Carel Fabritius, and entered the studio in 1640, being then fatherless, and in his fourteenth year. In many respects he was the most interesting of the pupils of this period, on account of his diversity of gifts and his breadth of character. He was a member of the Mennonite church, which at first admonished him for wearing a sword, and afterwards expelled him for alleged infractions of the rules and for marrying a woman outside of its community. He was very talented, and a profound student of the classics in literature and art, versed in abstruse theories of his profession, and skilful in writing tragedies and poems. "Poetry," he said, "is the sister of my goddess Pictura." In his famous book, "Introduction to the Higher School of Art," he gives glimpses of the inner life of Rembrandt's studio, and accounts of the pupils' discussions, — on what signs may lead one to see a good painter in a disciple, or what is the fundamental rule for a good ordering, or how one can perceive whether a history is well rendered by an artist. He says that once when he had wearied Rembrandt with theoretical questions, the master told him to work on up to the limit of his present knowledge, and that the things which he was prematurely reaching forward to, would come to him afterwards. Poor Hoogstraten narrates also, that he was often deeply aggrieved during the lessons, and that he would then feed himself upon tears until he had found and corrected the faults which the master had reproved. Herein we may see that there were sternly enforced rules and principles in the studio, though certain adverse critics maintain that Rembrandt was "the incarnate enemy of all system."

In 1642 life assumed her richest charms in the presence of Rembrandt, who was rich, honored, and beloved, and in the new picture of Banning Cock's company had reached the empyrean of his fame. But that mysterious power which (or Who) regulates the law of compensations, causing certain bitterness to lurk in every rose-wreathed cup, had prepared for the great master a disciplining grief, in whose presence all these honors became of no account. The blow was at the heart. In June it happened that Saskia, who had been declining for some time, was warned by unmistakable signs that her end was approaching. She hastened to arrange the estate for the benefit of those dearest to her, and had a will drawn up by the notary Barcman. In this document the well-beloved lady showed the implicit confidence which she reposed in her husband, and her lively solicitude for his future welfare. She made her infant son Titus the sole heir of the estate, with the condition that her husband should remain in usufructuary possession and administration thereof until his death or his second marriage, provided that he should properly educate the lad, and give him a sufficient marriage-portion in due time. If Titus should die, the entire estate should pass to Rembrandt unreservedly, save in case of a second marriage, when one-half thereof should be ceded to Hiskia van Ulenburgh. She expressly exempted her husband from giving an inventory of the property to any person, and from giving securities, "because she has confidence that he will act in this perfectly according to his conscience."

A few days later, and Saskia was dead, having attained only her thirtieth year. The grieving Rembrandt returned from her funeral at the Oude Kerk, to find the light gone out from his home forever. Henceforth he lived but to labor, earnestly and without repose, seeking to silence the memory of his sorrows by ceaseless pre-occupation. His manner of life was so simple, that he was frequently content to take his frugal meals at his easel, while the long days passed in the ceaseless labor which produced such an enormous number of works. Some biographers have even stated that his regular diet was bread and cheese and herrings, but this is certainly an exaggeration. While thus engaged in his studio he enjoyed the conversation of friends, especially when it was of an earnest character.

After 1642 another cause of trouble arose in the track of the master. Several of the northern artists who had studied in Italy, and absorbed the genius of Southern art, returned to the shores of the German Ocean, and popularized the Italian style. The reaction against the Rembranesque manner rose like an angry sea; and the master stood like a rock in the midst of the storm, and answered it with sublime defiances. By intense and assiduous labor he strove to strengthen his style, and produce peerless masterpieces. Strange fantasies played through his works; mysterious and sombre inspirations shone or gloomed forth upon his canvases.

The pride and independence of Rembrandt's manner stood firmly at counter-purpose with the spirit of the times. His noble peculiarities had been impressed on scores of pupils, and had moved and influenced many famous artists whom he had never seen,—Metsu, Cuyp, Van Everdingen, Ruysdael, Van Ostade, Wouverman, and others. But he had no Castiglione nor Aretino to translate his profound ideas into literature, no active princely patrons to insure him personal influence and power. Thus left alone before a hostile criticism, he did not yield to compromise, nor bend to conciliate, but answered only by fresh and more proudly characteristic works of art. The students returned from Italy, that holy land of art, with the ideas and the pictures of the orthodox schools of design; and the galleries of Holland were enriched with Italian compositions. Palladio and Scamozzi became the classic authorities for Dutch architecture; and the writings of the Italian poets and their older models were the models of the northern literati. Antique theories but half understood, and the barocco ideas of the decadence of southern art, were invoked against the genius of the greatest painter of the Netherlands. He remained firm, preserving the liberties of the Holland school, and exhibiting at once the boundless vigor and the fearless asperities of genius when assailed on all sides. With sorrowing pride he went on painting compositions which horrified the critics of Amsterdam, while the popular taste was being rapidly alienated from him.

Vosmaer says, in his eloquent defence, “He was not against these ideas: he was above them. He, an enemy of the science of art and of its theory? We have seen what manner of discourses were held in his studio with the master himself: he possessed unexampled collections. He, exclusive? He consulted the art of all periods, whose best products he recognized and bought at foolishly high prices. He, against the Italians? He owned their pictures and engravings, and gave his finest etching for a leaf of Marc Antonio, while many of his works show how much he admired the Italians. He, an enemy of the antique? He possessed casts of Greek and Roman statuary, and engravings of Roman architecture; and he himself filled a book with sketches from the antique. He loved them as truly as their most fervent champions, but he had penetrated much farther into their sentiment.”

has been returned to the Hague, where it is preserved in a private collection. Another brilliant work of 1643 was the 'Old Woman Weighing Pieces of Money,' now in the Dresden Museum, showing a wrinkled dame, sitting before a table, and testing gold coins in a balance. The subject recalls similar ideas in the more ancient schools of Quentin Massys and Lucas van Leyden.

The same year saw the usual group of remarkable portraits issue from the studio. The foremost of these was a full-length and life-size likeness of Madame Day, wife of that Martin Day, the Brazilian veteran, whom Rembrandt had portrayed several years before. The lady was undeniably homely; but the picture is one of the grandest and richest that can be imagined, full of delicate living lights, contrasting admirably with the black silk of the costume. This portrait and that of Martin Day were in the celebrated Van-Loon Collection, which was sold to the Rothschilds, late in 1877, for $800,000. Two other portraits, of life-size and three-quarters length, show a Dutch admiral (or gentleman) and his patrician wife. Two others, now in the Grosvenor Gallery, brilliantly reproduce a young seignior, evidently a jolly huntsman, with his charming blonde wife. Again, he portrays the venerable and learned historian, Dr. Heynsius, in the simple black costume of a scholar; Cornelia, mother of the artist, in two deep-toned pictures; Rembrandt himself, twice repeated; and several others. Such industry in the field of portrait-painting restricted his time for other work, so that the master made but five etchings during the year. One of these, however, was the favorite ‘Landscape with Three Trees,’ the finest and most grandiose of the master's engraved landscapes.

The only composition executed in 1644 was the famous picture of 'The Woman Taken in Adultery,' which has since brought $30,000 at public sale, and is now in the British National Gallery. The admirable arrangement of this work shows the unfortunate woman on her knees, weeping and humiliated, surrounded by an insolent and curious crowd, and denounced by a pitiless Pharisee. The barefooted and simply clad figure, standing protectingly above her, is Christ, attended by one of His apostles. The scene transpires in a vast colonnaded temple, and is overflowed by rich and mysterious light. This picture was sacredly kept in a locked cabinet in the house of the Burgomaster Six, until the Revolution, when it was taken to London, and sold to Mr. Angerstein for $25,000. Dr. Waagen calls it the best of Rembrandt's cabinet-pictures; and Hazlitt characterizes it as "prodigious in coloring, in light and shade, in pencilling, in solemn effect." Two other representations of this dramatic scene are now owned by British nobles.

The portraits of this time included a noble life-sized picture of the pensive and studious minister Sylvius, who died some years before. His face is angular and severe, with a forked beard; and the Institutiones Calvini is on the table before him. The pendant of this picture represents an aged dame, probably the minister's wife, seated in an arm-chair of red morocco. Several other portraits are referred to this date, and one etching.

The next year saw the production of several small compositions,—'The Tribute Money,' two Holy Families, and 'A Young Man Studying,' the latter of which is a beautiful little genre-painting. Queen Victoria owns a superb portrait-group of this time, showing the Burgomaster Pancras giving a collar of pearls to his wife; and similar contemporary works portray Eleazar Swalmius, a preacher of Amsterdam; a venerable white-bearded Rabbi, splendidly painted; and two young ladies. Among the eight etchings of the year are several quaint and pretty Dutch landscapes, a Repose in Egypt, and a portrait of Sylvius.

‘Abraham Receiving the Three Angels’ is a little gem of a picture, executed in 1646, and now in a British private gallery. The scene of ‘The Adoration of the Shepherds’ was twice repeated at this period, and both pictures are now preserved, at Munich and in the British National Gallery. One of them was made for the Stadtholder, and was accompanied by a picture of ‘The Circumcision.’ The Prince paid the great sum of 2,400 florins for these two works. Several of the etchings of this period represent scenes which are unfortunately not even equivocal, and the delineation of which would justly be considered scandalous to-day.

In 1647 Rembrandt painted life-sized portraits of Claes Berchem and his wife, which are now in the Grosvenor Gallery. Berchem was a brother-artist and bric-a-brac hunter, who had studied in Italy, and afterwards lived at Haarlem. Other portraits of this year showed Ephraim Bonus, “the little doctor” (with an etching of the same subject); the widow of the Remonstrant minister of Gouda; Councillor Nagel, of Nymegen; and Rembrandt himself. Among the contemporary etchings were portraits of Jan Six; of Asselyn, the artist, an adherent of Claude at Rome; and of Dr. van der Linden.

In 1647 Rembrandt etched an admirable portrait of Jan Six, in the cabinet of an amateur and collector, surrounded by rare old books and weapons. A year later, Six published his tragedy of "Medea," and his artist-friend furnished it with an engraving of the nuptials of Jason and Creusa.

The intimacy between Jan Six and Rembrandt was of a memorable character. Six was a young gentleman of one of the patrician families of Amsterdam, and rose from one office to another until he became burgomaster of the city (in 1691). He was an enthusiastic student and poet, and wrote the long poems of "Muiderberg" and "Medea," besides many shorter odes and sonnets, and was on intimate relations with Vondel and other minstrels of his time. His friendship with Rembrandt began probably in 1641, when the artist was painting the portrait of Madame Six, Jan's mother, and was speedily deepened by the similar tastes of the two men. Six had already lavished great sums in the acquisition of curiosities and works of art, rare books and classic marbles. He owned pictures by Titian, Sebastiano, Palma, Giorgione, Holbein, Van Dyck, Poussin, and the ancient and modern Dutch masters, with several works by his friends Lievens, Flinck, and Rembrandt. In 1647 the master etched 'The Bridge of Six,' near his comrade's country-seat of Elsbrock; and a legend states that he finished the whole work while the servant was hunting up the mustard for the dinner. Six made frequent attempts to introduce his artist friend into the circles of patrician life; but the sturdy old painter refused to be drawn out in this way, and declined all invitations. His was not the spirit to waste or lower itself in trivial adulation of empty-headed and full-pursed Dutch aristocrats, and he preferred to remain altogether aloof from high life. Still it is not true, as many say, that he sought low company, as more congenial to him on account of his birth and proclivities. He was not low-born, nor were his associates in after-life of mean estate.

No painter has left so many portraits of himself as this one did,—rare and curious autobiographical signs, infinitely varied, idealized above or below, rarely mere physiognomic studies, but illustrating various phases of his character, now joyful and smiling, now self-conscious and audacious, now proud and lordly. At one time his massive head is depicted with mane-like hair and beard, broad and firm-set mouth, and glaring eyes, like the head of a lion. Again the features are refined and delicate, though large, with an air of elegant disdain, and bright, piercing eyes, as if he was some great and haughty lord. Yet again, and in his younger days, he appears as a warrior, bearing a banner or a flashing sword, with the battle-light gleaming in his eyes. His costumes were of every variety, from the treasures of his museum—knightly armor, quaint and gorgeous robes and caps, precious jewels and chains of gold.

From 1643 to 1648 Rembrandt executed no portrait of himself. The joyful life had passed away when Saskia's body had been laid in the vaults of the Oude Kerk, and henceforth he ceased to delight in seeing himself robed in rich costumes and embroidered robes. In 1648 he portrayed himself in the simplicity of an ordinary citizen, unadorned, with short hair and thin moustache, holding no more a sword, but only his crayon and drawing-sheet, yet looking straight out of the picture with more to landscape-painting, and delineated several hill-country districts, as well as designs and etchings of similar purport.

After 1653 the master devoted but little attention to landscapes, and his studies in out-door life hardly began before 1640, so that his career in this department was of comparatively short duration. Still it sufficed to mark him as truly a leader therein. Several fine examples of his sympathetic interpretation of Nature are preserved in the British and Continental galleries, showing vivid sunsets, rolling hills, the banks of dreamy rivers, and cloudy skies arching over broad and populous plains. Again, he portrays some sweet and peaceful hamlet among the polders, surrounded by verdant groves and silvery water-ways, therein translating Nature into true yet ideal language, and investing it with the poetry of color.

No country offers so few charms to a landscape-painter as Holland, with its unbroken levels of cultivated plains or moors, devoid of lakes or hills, cascades or passes, and even lacking in the glorious sky of the more southern countries. Yet the Dutch painters have always loved Nature, and delighted in portraying her most monotonous moods. To the names of Cuyp, Ruysdael, and Koninck, let us add that of Rembrandt, who joined their number only after many years of his career had passed. He possessed many engravings of Swiss, High German, and Italian scenery, and several of the masterly landscapes of Hercules Seghers. The love of natural scenery, even in the drowned lands, slowly took possession of him, and he passed out from his usual sketching rambles along the city-fortifications and avenues, and took long excursions in the country and among the suburban hamlets. Here he sketched the quaint and interesting objects which he met on all sides,—the rural spires overtopping thick groves; the canal-boats slowly swashing down the long water-lanes; the sand-hills and the ponderous dykes along the sea-front; and the ruined farms and churches which Spain had left among the Batavian marshes. The district of Gooiland, stretching eastward along the Zuyder Zee and southward toward Utrecht, was his favorite region, with its three fair cities of Muiden, Naarden, and Weesp, and the country-seats of many rich and cultured families of Amsterdam. Here dwelt Uyttenboogaert, Tromp, Six, Hooft, and the Hinloopens; and the artist's nephew Sylvius was pastor of Muiderberg, near the manor-house of Muiden, so celebrated for its literary assemblies.

The travels of Rembrandt were of narrow scope. His sketches show that he had visited Dordrecht, Rotterdam, Nymegen, and Cleves; and his hill-country scenes were probably composed among the abrupt wooded ranges about the last-named town. There is a wide variety in his sketches. Some are merely hasty outlines, and others bear evidence of long and careful elaboration.

The group of students under Rembrandt's instruction between 1650 and 1654 included several who were afterwards prominent. Nicolaes Maes of Dordrecht was one of the ablest and most original of these, and became eminent in genre and portrait painting. Heiman Dullaert of Rotterdam, the poet and musician, was another member of this group, and afterwards attained eminence as a painter of portraits and interiors, settling at Rotterdam, whence he corresponded with his old master. Other pupils were Gerard Ulenburgh, the landscape-painter and picture-dealer; Franz Wulphagen, of Bremen; Johann Ulrich Mayr, of Augsburg; and Michiel Willemans, a German artist.

The great composition of 'Jesus Blessing the Little Children,' was painted about the year 1650, and is full of rich effects; the Saviour's head being especially notable for its rare expression of melancholy tenderness. This picture was purchased for the British National Gallery, a few years since, at the price of $35,000. About this time also, he made portraits of Clement de Jonghe, the Calverstraat picture-dealer; Van Tromp, the doughty old admiral who had swept the North Sea with his victorious fleets; and other persons, whose names have not been saved from oblivion, though their features are perpetuated to our days.

Fifty-seven etchings attest the iron diligence of the master between 1649 and 1655. Among these were several views of the region about the country-seat of the receiver Uyttenboogaert, near Naarden and the moors of Gooiland, indicating that the artist still preserved his intimacy with that gentleman, and found familiar scenes about his home. The mellifluous name of Uyttenboogaert was woven into the eulogistic verses of Huygens; and the Latin muse of Barlaeus had striven to celebrate it in the language of Virgil. One of the best etchings of this period was 'The Landscape with a Tower,' showing the pretty hamlet of Loenen, in Gooiland; and others illustrate charming landscape effects.
The celebrated 'Piece of a Hundred Florins,' or 'Jesus Healing the Sick,' is Rembrandt's masterpiece in etching, as 'The Company of Frans Banning Cock' is in painting. It marks his advent into a new and more stable manner of design, after the manifold experimental works of previous years, and combines the noblest traits of his most famous works. The calm and serene figure of the great Healer is surrounded by groups of maimed and sick persons, with plump and incredulous Pharisees closely observing the passing events. The first proofs of this engraving command enormous and increasing prices, there being but eight in existence, five of which are in Great Britain. In 1847 one of these was sold in London for $600; and the same copy brought $5,000 at a public sale in 1867.

In the six years after 1649, Rembrandt executed sixteen sketches, including several in Six's album; a St. Sebastian, after Leonardo; and a representation of the mournful scene in Gethsemane.

'Bathsheba' was the chief picture of 1654, and portrayed a Titianesque naked woman sitting in a rich golden light, and reading King David's letter. 'The Bather' was of the same date, and presents a lady clad in a chemise, with her feet in the water.
This composition is now in the British National Gallery, by Holwell Carr's bequest. Waagen compares it to a Correggio; and Landseer says that "It is the most artful thing ever done in painting, and the most unsophisticated."

The finest work of Rembrandt which the Louvre now possesses is a portrait of a lady, in rich amber lights, carefully finished, and yielding in nothing to the Titian that hangs beside it. Several other famous portraits date from this year, and also twelve etchings of religious scenes; with a pleasant likeness of the master's son Titus, then twelve years old.
CHAPTER VII.

With all Rembrandt's faithful labor, his pecuniary affairs seem to have gone on steadily from bad to worse. In 1653 he borrowed large sums, nearly $1,000 each, from Cornelis Witsen and Isaac van Hertsbeeck; and, in the following year, his house in the Breedstraat was heavily mortgaged. Renewed troubles befell the master during the next three years, from importunate creditors and unsympathetic legal officers.

In the summer of 1654 Hendrickie Jaghers, a maid-servant in Rembrandt's house, was summoned before the consistory of the Reformed Church, to answer to charges of improper relations between herself and her master. She acknowledged the truth of the accusation, and was reprimanded and forbidden to partake of the Holy Communion. Kramm, in his "Vie des Peintres," fer was not followed by further cessions; or Rembrandt may have deeded the property to his son, as a last resort, to save it from the approaching financial disaster.

After Rembrandt's death a certain Catharina van Wyck is registered in the Dead-book of the West Church as his widow, appearing before the proper authorities to depose about the heritage of their children. Nothing further is known of this lady, or whence she came, or when he married her.

Amidst the domestic and financial misfortunes which were now befalling him on every side, the spirit of the artist did not blench, nor his pencil lose its power. With a sublime buoyancy he rose above the waves of disaster which rolled so angrily about his house, and nerved himself to higher and nobler efforts. During the tumults of 1655 he found time and heart to produce the 'Ecce Homo,' three life-sized portraits of standard-bearers and civic guards, and a highly finished picture of the interior of a stable, with twelve etchings. Four of the latter represented Jacob's ladder, David and Goliath, the statue of Nebuchadnezzar, and the vision of Ezekiel, and were used in illustrating Manasseh Ben-Israel's curious book, La Piedra Gloriosa. Two other noble etchings of this year were 'Jesus Shown to the People,' and 'The Three Crosses,' the latter of which portrays the scene at Calvary,—the crosses bathed in celestial light, and groups of soldiers, Jews, and disciples in the deep shadows below.

In this year Jan Six married Marguerite, the daughter of Dr. Tulp; and he was soon afterwards named commissary of marriages, a position of much importance in the cities of Holland. At this time Rembrandt executed a noble portrait of the new functionary, which the tuneful Vondel apostrophized in verse. The present head of the Six family now owns this and other fine works of his ancestor's friend.

By 1656 Rembrandt's estate was irretrievably embarrassed; and he transferred the house and land to his son Titus, reserving for himself the present administration during the pleasure of Saskia's family. A few weeks later, he was declared insolvent; and an inventory of his possessions was made by the officers of the law. How did the improvident artist rush into such a disaster? He had 40,000 florins from his wife alone, and earned great sums steadily from his pictures and pupils. He evidently had believed that the fortune was inexhaustible, and spent money without stint on all manner of objects of art and curiosity. His generosity was equal to his improvidence, and was manifested on all sides.

The Van Ryn family at Leyden was undeniably poor in these later years. Adriaen had sold half of the mill; the widow afterwards leased the remainder; in 1652 another brother was publicly reported as "notoriously poor;" and his sister Lysbeth was rated as "half insolvent." These kinspeople were sadly necessitous; and they probably drew heavily on their prosperous and generous brother. Furthermore it is recorded that, within a few years of Saskia's death, he was compelled by certain of her relatives to make an inventory of his goods, which were then valued at over 40,000 francs. They demanded that Titus's half of the estate should be settled on him, and that he should receive a mortgage on the remainder. The constant suits of these imprudent persons greatly annoyed the master, and hampered his business for some years.

The home-troubles of 1656 did not prevent the completion of several noble works of art, foremost among which was another picture like 'The School of Anatomy,' showing Dr. Deyman and eight other prominent physicians of Amsterdam. This composition was described by Sir Joshua Reynolds as possessing traits suggestive of Michael Angelo and Titian. It was injured by fire in 1723, and has since disappeared. Another great work, now at Cassel, represents the scene in which the aged patriarch Jacob blesses the sons of Joseph, in a rich and beautiful composition of classic correctness and unfailing interest. The light is of that mysterious tint which marked the transition from the golden hues of the earlier works to the warm and vigorous harmonies of the succeeding manner. 'The Preaching of St. John the Baptist,' now in England, is another large and brilliant work, containing a hundred or more figures, grandly composed, and displayed in a picturesque mountain landscape. This is one of the noblest masterpieces of the great Hollander, and is full of realistic groups, powerful and expressive faces, and harmonious and tranquil lights and shades. The large composition of 'The Lord of the Vineyard,' and a cabinet-picture of the head of Christ, were also executed this year, together with several etchings and portraits.
The engraved portraits of 1655-56 included several of masterly ability,—the elder Hareng, imitable in its delicate shading; and Hareng the younger, of which Charles Blanc says, "How far does the power of genius reach! Behold a simple doorkeeper; and, from the moment when he poses before Rembrandt, what a ray of poetry lightens up his narrow dwelling! He is transfigured under the eye of the painter." Another portrayed Abraham Francen, the picture-dealer, a friend and bondsman of the distressed artist and his son, showing him surrounded with objects of art and vertu. Another fine picture represents Johannes Jutma, the venerable sculptor, who had studied at Rome, and afterwards became a friend of Rembrandt and a fellow-amateur. Still another brilliant etching portrayed Dr. Tholinx, a famous physician of the city.

The foremost picture of 1657 was 'The Adoration of the Magi,' which is now in Buckingham Palace. It attained a wide celebrity, even during the lifetime of the artist, and is now of great pecuniary value. The grouping displays admirable skill; and the costumes of the three holy kings are full of rich and curious details. The general tone of the picture is deep, ripe, and golden. Another large painting of this date shows 'Joseph Accused by Potiphar's Wife.' Three of the seven portraits of 1657 were likenesses of Rembrandt, no more the gay chevalier of his younger time, richly and often fantastically clad, but now a fast aging man, with full features, a shaven beard, a scant moustache, and graying hair.

At the close of the year 1657, the household-goods and most of the rich collections of the master were removed by the legal officers to the Imperial-Crown Hotel, in the Kalver Street, where they were sold at auction, to satisfy the demands of the creditors. During the next year, his engravings and designs were disposed of in the same way. Thus, in a few hours, were dispersed the superb collections of art and bric-à-brac which Rembrandt had devoted his lifetime and sacrificed an ample fortune to gather together. How the proud artist's heart must have writhed under this affliction, as he saw his precious antiques and curiosities passing under the hammer of the auctioneer! It is intimated that he was living at that time in the Imperial-Crown Hotel, with his son Titus, homeless and poor, after all his prodigious labors.

These matchless collections of curiosities and pictures brought only about $1,000,—a mere fraction of their value, even at that time. Now they would bring at least half a million. Amsterdam was then under the cold clouds of hard times and a general commercial prostration; hundreds of houses were unoccupied, and rents were greatly diminished; laws were enacted against luxurious living; and public works were stopped half-way.

Where were Rembrandt's powerful patrons in these dark days? They preferred to let the law take its course, like the hard-headed and practical Dutchmen that they were, and to relieve their friend when he had passed through the courts. In the subsequent months they are often seen in close relations with him, slowly helping him onward.

The magnificent pictures entitled 'The Jewish Bride,' and 'Rembrandt and his Family,' were executed about this time. The former represents a rosy and smiling lady (not a Jewess), richly robed and profusely jewelled, with a man about fifty years old, who is adorning her neck with a chain. The second picture shows the same persons, with three children, the gentleman being in the shadow, and the others forming a luminous mass of brilliancy. No answer returns to the question as to whom these tains, scores of statues, and mechanically moving groups illustrating scenes from the Bible and the classic mythology. The fountains were adorned with symbolic representations of the four quarters of the globe, the four seasons, the four elements, the four virtues, and the four vices; and elsewhere were Bacchus and his satyrs, Cupid in a chariot drawn by tigers, Theseus fighting the Centaur, St. John preaching to the Jews, the palace of Solomon, Herodias's daughter dancing, the martyrdom of the Apostles, the tyrant Duke of Alva, Esther and Ahasuerus, St. Bartholomew, and a cock which crowed every hour. In this curious assemblage of scenes from the Augustan and the Christian civilizations, we may see a reflex of the spirit of the age, in which its great works of art and literature were executed. How often must our artist have whiled away his sad hours, so full of disappointment and chagrin, amid these bizarre collections!

The Rosengracht quarter was a retired and respectable part of the city, inhabited chiefly by citizens of modest means. Rembrandt seems to have preferred to live in such sequestered streets, even during his affluence, avoiding the bustle and confusion of the commercial districts. His new home was near the triangular bastions of the city wall, with their encircling boulevards and wide protecting canals, their tall and picturesque windmills, and gates opening toward the fields, where he could gratify his passion for sketching-rambles among the hamlets and farms. The Bloemgracht, where he resided before his marriage with Saskia, was only two blocks from the Rosengracht, so that the scenes of the early triumphs and of the old-age struggles were close together.

Rembrandt's house on the Rose-Canal is yet standing, and bears a shield with the date of 1652. It is a pleasant and commodious domicile, still adorned inside with the remains of the extensive Carrara-marble decorations and floorings which were placed in it when first built. The financial distress of our artist did not then force him into a squalid retreat, but his unceasing energy enabled him to make a congenial and comfortable new home.

It does not appear that the old veteran was left to sink into an evening life of misanthropy and gloomy meditations, for the city was filled with his friends and admirers. His former pupils, Bol, Flinck, Eeckhout, Koninck, and others, remained near him, and were now wealthy and respected. A group of younger artists also gave him their hearts in ardent admiration and respect. Coppenol, the Lutmas, De Decker, Heyblocq, the picture-dealer Francen, Zomer, all these remained on friendly terms with the master. In the new home the artist thus dwelt in tranquillity, probably with his family about him, and young children charming the long hours of his declining years.

The next year witnessed the production of three portraits, including the remarkable one now in the Louvre; the composition of the 'Ecce Homo,' in the Darmstadt Museum; and six fine etchings,—'The Samaritan Woman at the Well,' 'The Presentation in the Temple,' and four studies of women at the bath, etc. The latter are all from one model, whom Blanc supposes to have been the master's second wife.

The chief works of 1659 are now both at the Berlin Museum, and represent 'Moses Descending from Sinai, and Breaking the Tables of the Law' and 'Jacob Wrestling with the Angels,' very large canvases imbued with sombre and mysterious depths of coloring. Three brilliant portraits of Rembrandt himself were executed this year, with a simple and serious expression, but showing a fearless and vigorous face. Three etchings finish the list of 1659, and include a brilliant and velvety composition of "Jupiter and Antiope," and also a landscape, a rare feature in these late years.

The works of 1660 were all of a portrait character, and included a "St. Francis," a "Philosopher in Meditation," and an aged woman, supposed to have been the artist's grandmother. Three new portraits of Rembrandt also appeared at this time, showing him, not as a seignior, nor yet as a military hero, but in the guise and attitude of a painter, busy before his canvas.

"The Syndics of the Guild of Clothmakers," now in the Amsterdam Museum, was executed in 1661, and was the noblest work of the master's later years. The subject is uninteresting, but the picture itself is a consummate flower of art. The five syndics are portrayed as seated in their oaken-wainscoted apartment, and are all of life-size, and dressed in black suits, with large black hats and broad collars. The noble heads of these doughty old magistrates are full of life and character, and their eyes look out at the spectator. The coloring is simple and natural, the prevalent hues are dark, and there are no strong lights; yet the general effect is so vivid and realistic that the portraits hanging near it in the Museum appear cold and lifeless in comparison.

Other works of this year were the life-sized and half-length figure of St. Matthew, now in the Louvre; the 'Ecce Homo' and 'The Circumcision,' now in England; and several portraits. The etchings included the magnificent 'Woman with an Arrow,' showing a nude woman seated on a bed, and seen from the back; and the portrait of the white-haired Lieven Coppenol, holding pen and paper, and looking towards the spectator. It seems that through all the many years of trouble and hard work, the master had kept up friendly relations with the companion of his early manhood, whom he now portrayed in the white winter of age. This picture is also remarkable as the last etching which Rembrandt executed, and the end of a long series of grand and marvellous works.

The closest research has failed to find any trace of the activity of the master during the years 1662 and 1663. Neither painting nor etching can be attributed to those dates, and the life of the artist seems to have been a blank throughout the entire period. The intense vigor of the earlier days appears to have failed suddenly, and fallen into a

Even during his declining years Rembrandt instructed two pupils, and filled them with his victorious ideas. One of these was Godfrey Kneller, who entered the studio in 1668, and was taught afterwards by Bol. The other was Arnout de Gelder of Dordrecht, who remained from 1665 to 1668, and gave himself up entirely to the powerful influence of the master, showing the reflected light of that inspiration in his coloring, effects, and execution, and even in adopting his favorite Biblical themes for illustration. De Gelder was also infected with the perilous antiquarian tastes of his teacher, and collected all manner of quaint and curious objects.

Slowly the energy and ambition of the master seem to have returned to him; for in the year 1666 he executed no less than four paintings,—an ‘Ecce Homo,’ another ‘Suicide of Lucretia,’ and two portraits. The silence of the critics, even those most eulogistic of his earlier works, leaves us to infer that these sunset paintings showed evidences of decadence.

The only composition of the next year was ‘Joseph Going forth to Meet his Father,’ in which the venerable Jacob is seen kneeling, while his distinguished son approaches with groups of warriors, pages, and richly-dressed ladies. Five portraits bear the date of 1667, the most notable of which represented the celebrated naturalist Johannes Swammerdam, surrounded by appropriate objects. Another likeness shows the venerable artist himself, with a wrinkled and furrowed face, whose flesh appears soft and drooping. He is still bravely arrayed in a furry robe and a velvet cap, with a chain on his breast.

In 1668 Titus van Ryn was twenty-seven years old, and had so far prospered in life that he married his cousin Magdalena van Loo, of one of the Frisian families which were connected with the Ulenburghs. The young couple went to live in a house bearing the emblem of the golden balance, opposite the apple-market, and fronting on the Singel, one of the great quays on the east side of the city. But only a few months had passed away when Titus died. In the next March his widow had a female infant, and Rembrandt was present at the baptism, when it was named Titia. A few weeks later, the mother died also.

Early in October Rembrandt was taken sick; and on the eighth day of the month the hearty and robust old man, only sixty-two years old, passed away. His funeral was of the simplest character, and he was interred in the West Church. The registered expense of the burial shows that it cost only fifteen florins. How different from the imposing magnificence of Rubens's funeral, when great processions followed the artist's remains to his superb sepulchral chapel!
CHAPTER VIII.

Rembrandt of the Rhine is at the head of the Dutch school of painting, and was the true product and exponent of his time and country. His original and poetic nature showed itself in the personal and subjective side of his works, in rare and picturesque effects attained by astonishing lights, unusual arrangements, and the employment of quaint and striking costumes and physiognomies. In his riper years, much of this experimental versatility was laid aside, and his paintings are objective and humanistic, with such traits of universality that they appeal as surely to the latest ages as to his own. He advanced from the study and elaboration of details and accessories to a profound concentration in great masses, and an amplitude of range which included all manner of subjects, from children to dotards, from beggars to princes. His perfect command over the entire range of human experience gives him the right to be called the painter of the life of men and of nature. These things he studied profoundly, and acquired the ability to thoroughly know the details, and yet to subordinate them to the general effect. Herein he made the rare combination of realism and idealism, the imaginative transfiguration of the fruits of positive study. Yet the materials with which he formed his groupings were not the brilliant costumes and clear-cut faces of Romans and Venetians, but the massive and phlegmatic Hollanders, dull themes for poetry or poetic limning. Quinet wonders that his magic coloring could have been executed under "the leaden sky" of the Low Countries; and Vosmaer answers with a proud defence of his native land.

Modern art was slowly emancipating itself from the former functions of preparing religious and mythological hieroglyphics, and was becoming purely pictorial in its scope, and closely allied with the general illustration of nature and life. The studio was no longer to be an appanage of the church or the extinct pagan civilizations, but a possession of the people, the city, the farm. So the great Holland master displayed his sturdy and sometimes gloomy republicanism in his hearty attachment to the human manifestation of his art. He represented the sacred personages of Scripture from an intelligible point of view, and passed by the symbolical and the allegorical unheeded. Perhaps this practical interpretation was carried too far, as was natural for the plain folk by the North Sea. Quinet says that Rembrandt's Bible is the Bible of the iconoclasts, his apostles are mendicants, and his Christ is the Christ of the ragamuffins. But the apostles were indeed men of low estate, poor handworkers, living by labor and alms; and not foppish old philosophers and savants, posed in Roman drapery, as the Italian artists portrayed them. It was happily reserved for the English Pre-Raphaelites of to-day to steer between the Scylla and Charybdis of classic senators and indigent Dutch boors, and represent the personages of sacred story as humble but inspired Syrian pilgrims, with Hebrew faces and costumes.

As the great head of the rising Protestant art, Rembrandt studied the Scriptures in the light of modern thought, carefully, and without regard to the quaint mystical traditions of Italy. Athanase Coquerel has given us an interesting chapter on the Biblical researches of the great Hollander, as exemplified in his works. M. de Ronchaud writes, with eloquence and truth, "It may be said of Rembrandt, that he has renewed the Christian legend by removing from the sacred subjects all external poesy foreign to the spirit of the gospel. The personages of the Biblical scenes, animated by him with sentiments profoundly human, regain in significance, moral and Christian (in the large sense of the word), what they lose in nobility and splendor. The vulgarity of the types may even seem a return to the true Christian sentiment. The Christ of Rembrandt, is he not the Christus inglorius, ignobilis, in honorabilis, of Tertullian? Here the semi-pagan ideal of the Italian Renaissance yields to another ideal more truly Christian, in that it is more universal and more human, the expressive ideal which issues from the depths of the soul."

Rembrandt has been called "The Painter of Beggars," and in this department he rivalled his great contemporary Murillo. Especially in his etchings are such subjects brought out; and many of his most finished prints illustrated this disagreeable phase of life. The mendicants of the Germanic races are but ill adapted for the glorification of art or poetry.

parent shadows and concentrated lights; a soft blending, or, as the French would say, a marriage of tints; and a sweet and strong harmony of intermediaries. The belief was at one time entertained, that Rembrandt prepared his canvases with gold-leaf, so rich and luminous were his colors, so full of warmth and power.

The early Italians, like Fra Angelico, seemed to have found only clear light and unrelieved splendor in their landscapes. But the sturdy and gloomy republican who painted under the gray sea-skies of the north threw a profound shadow over his noblest works, broken only by phantasmagoric gleams of intense brilliancy. Though the north wind drove the heavy mists through the streets of Amsterdam, and the long winter overhung the ice-bound canals with curtains of snow-clouds; still, in all his portrayals of men and nature, he threw the same flashes of rich illumination, as if he held Horace's words as a motto:—

The Dutch poets of the seventeenth century, who twisted their rugged language daily into stanzas which aped those of the Latins in the Augustan age, were for the most part silent with regard to Rembrandt, although they often honored his lesser brethren in honeyed numbers. Jan Vos indeed alluded to certain of his works; and Jeremias de Decker, after the master had painted his portrait gratuitously, sung that "He has carried his master-glory as far as the ships of free Holland are wafted; and it has flown across the Alps, and thrown Italy into raptures, holding itself alongside of Raphael and Angelo." But Vondel, the great head of Dutch poetry, though flowery and flattering in his eulogies of many other artists, is cold and silent before this one. The reason might have been, that the master never painted his portrait without charge, for the five artists who were sagacious enough to pay this tribute were elevated to the summit of Vondel's Walhalla. Moreover, the poet was no judge of art, save in its literary aspect, and preferred conventional forms and classic traditions, whereof Rembrandt was no exponent. In his ardent praise of the master's rivals and their methods, he even attacks the manner of the great realist, in denouncing his "factitious shadows."

Pels, the cold and correct academic poet, embodied the opinion of the Dutch coterie in the following sentences: “You deceive yourselves, you who wish to leave the well-worn paths, who wish, in your despair, to seek a more perilous way, and, pleased with passing praise, to follow that great Rembrandt, who, seeing that he could not equal Titian, Van Dyck, nor Michael Angelo, preferred to wander in a glittering mannerism, to be the first heretic in art, and to lose many novices in his snares,—rather than to strengthen himself in following those who were endowed by experience, and to submit his celebrated pencil to rules. He it was who, yielding to none in his grouping or the power of coloring, when he wished to paint a nude woman, chose not the Greek Venus for a model, but some washerwoman or gross farm-maid, naming his fault ‘the imitation of nature,’ and holding all else as vain ornaments.”

Joachim Sandrart, the eminent German art-writer, lived at Amsterdam from 1637 to 1642, and wrote as follows: “It is astonishing that the eminent Rembrandt van Ryn, though born in the country, and of a father who was a miller, was so excellently endowed by nature, that, by his assiduous zeal and deep innate inclination, he attained a lofty position in art. . . . By his natural talent, indefatigable zeal, and constant study, he lacked nothing except the knowledge of the antique, and of the theory of art, which are obtained in Italy and elsewhere.” The critic then goes on at great length to deplore Rembrandt’s scorn of academic rules and the Raphael-esque canons of art, while praising his intense naturalism, perfect harmony, and zealous industry. He says that the master’s pupils paid him annually one hundred florins each, besides the large sums which he derived from selling their works.

Philip Angel, a contemporary artist and author of Haarlem, praised the deep and careful studies of Rembrandt, and his researches in history, whose results appeared in his paintings. Hoogstraten alternately praised and blamed his works, as he touched on their varying peculiarities. Houbraken noticed the master’s style unfavorably, as a mere passing fashion, much as the modern critics speak of Gustave Doré, and for similar reasons.

Lairesse, a famous doctor of art early in the eighteenth century, credited Rembrandt with a vigorous coloring, equal to Titian’s, but reproached him with heresy in all other departments of art. So far had the denunciations of the critics affected the laity, that, at this time, an authentic portrait painted by the master sold for six cents, though but a few years later it was valued at several hundreds of florins. The people demanded that their pictures should be bright and pretty, and cared for no higher traits. Still, beyond the narrow Dutch provinces, a wider appreciation was felt; and Rembrandt’s paintings were sold at high prices in France and Italy.

Fuseli, the idealistic but acrimonious Swiss-English critic, cried out, in exaggerated bitterness, “The female forms of Rembrandt are prodigies of deformity; his males are the products of shuffling industry and sedentary toil.” Sir Edmund Head acknowledges the truth of these charges in the following bit of singular nonsense: “The artist’s power is best felt by considering what grandeur, and even sublimity, is often concentrated within a few square inches of copper or canvas, in spite of the debased nature of the materials which are worked up into such a wondrous whole. We may fairly suppose that Rembrandt cultivated ugliness in his forms, in order to show what obstacles he could overcome.” What an extraordinary motive to attribute to a laborious and conscientious artist!
Fuseli calls Rembrandt "a meteor in art." Fiorillo says that, beside his pictures, all others seem like mere geographical charts. When Planche named the artists of the first rank, he inscribed the names of Leonardo, Raphael, Angelo, Correggio, Titian, Rubens, and Rembrandt.

Rembrandt was in no sense a man of the world; and he preferred the society of ordinary citizens to the fickle patronage of the great. Houbraken says that in his riper years he was intimate with people of the bourgeois class and those who practised art. The former term at that time implied persons who were not nobles, magistrates, nor office-holders,—the great middle class of merchants and artisans, which forms the strength of every Christian nation. The master himself said, "When I desire to rest my spirit, I do not seek honors, but liberty." Sandrart says that, if Rembrandt had known how to manage better, he would have advanced himself greatly; "because, though he was not a dissipator, he nevertheless knew not how to preserve his position, and always associated with simple and bourgeois persons."

In respect to civic or official honors, Rembrandt was indeed a prophet without honor in his own country. When Maria de' Medici and other noble queens and princes visited the city, other artists were chosen to perpetuate the scenes and to execute the decorations. The master was also ignored when the pictures commemorative of the Peace of Westphalia were painted; and also in the adornment of the new City Hall, "the eighth wonder of the world."

Descamps states that Rembrandt was full of irregularities and odd eccentricities, for which no reason can be imagined. He would often finish the unimportant accessories of a picture with minutest care, and dash off the most conspicuous parts with a few strokes of his brush, assuring his dissatisfied patrons that "a picture is finished when the author thereof has fulfilled the purpose with which he began it." One day he was making a portrait-group of a notable family, when he was informed that his favorite monkey had died. The grieving artist caused the body to be brought to the studio, and made its portrait on the same canvas on which he was engaged. The family aforesaid was naturally incensed at such an interpolation, and demanded that it should be effaced; but Rembrandt preferred to keep the whole work himself, and let his patrons seek a more accommodating artist.

loan the costumes and other properties of his museum to poorer painters who needed to use them; and he furnished designs to them in unstinted abundance. His hospitality was open and free, as poor Brouwer found when he was a fugitive in Amsterdam.

Smith's "Catalogue Raisonné" contains a list of 620 paintings by Rembrandt, of which 59 are from Old-Testament subjects, 71 from the New Testament, 12 from the lives of the saints, 51 genre themes, 11 historical and mythological compositions, 43 portraits of himself, 247 portraits of men, 106 portraits of women, and 20 landscapes. To these may be added many hundreds of drawings and sketches, still preserved in European collections, and held at a high pecuniary value. The master also executed 365 etchings, with 237 variations besides; and many others there are which reputable critics attribute to his hand. The man who could execute such an enormous mass of noble work, not in a Titian-life of nearly a century, but in little more than thirty years, was certainly possessed of an astounding power of invention and an unparalleled industry.

ARTIST-BIOGRAPHIES.

VAN DYCK.

BOSTON:
HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY.
1880.
THOUGH memorable for its results the life-time of Van Dyck was short, and its most eventful years were spent in alien lands. Almost every detail of the careers of Rubens and Rembrandt is known to us, but neither history nor tradition has been so regardful of the third great artist of the Low Countries, and the records of Van Dyck's life are deplorably meagre. All that is known of him is so chivalric and picturesque that we involuntarily reach out for the whole story, but always in vain. The whirl of battle which overswept Great Britain soon after his death carried away the personal memories of the artist of the Stuarts as effectually as it destroyed the crown and the mitre.

The main authority on which this biographical sketch rests is the careful account of Van Dyck in the seventh volume of Michielis's Histoire de la Peinture Flamande, a work which is justly celebrated for its evidences of critical acumen and diligent research. In connection therewith I have studied W. Hookham Carpenter's "Van Dyck and his Contemporaries," an interesting memoir published in London about forty years ago, and containing several state papers relating to the artist. The notes on the English and Scottish portraits and their subjects were taken from that most interesting work, Lodge's "Portraits of Illustrious Personages of Great Britain" (Bohn's eight-volume edition. London: 1850).

Certain anecdotes and other details of the life of Van Dyck have been found also in the works of Walpole, Jarves, Redgrave, Richardson, and Mengs; and in the biographies of Rubens, Reynolds, and Wilkie. M. F. Sweetser.

hood of St. Luke, between 1497 and 1523, as artists or amateurs. Francis Van Dyck became very wealthy, and was also famous for his fervent piety, by reason of which he was chosen a director of the Chapel of the Holy Sacrament. In 1590 he took his second wife, Mary Cuypers, to whom he was united in the cathedral of his native city; and she bore him no fewer than twelve children during the next sixteen years. Five of these inherited the austere devotion of their father to such a degree that they devoted themselves to God, and entered a religious life. Theodore was a canon of the Abbey of St. Michael, and pastor of Minderhout; Anne was a Faucontine nun; and Cornelia, Susannah, and Elizabeth entered the Convent of the Beguinage. These sisters were always beloved by Anthony, who dedicated to them at least two of his finest engravings; and another was dedicated to the priest Theodore. Still another sister, Catherine, married Sieur Adrien Diercx, a notary of Antwerp, in the year 1610.

Van Grimbergen holds that Van Dyck was born in the house which is still standing at No. 300 Courte-Rue Neuve; but Van Lerius maintains that his birthplace was in the house called Den Berendans, at the iron bridge near the old grain-market, and almost opposite the ancient city hall.

The mother of this worthy family was filled with artistic ideas, and gave free utterance to them by the aid of the favorite feminine implement, the needle, in countless square yards of delicate embroidery and tapestry-work. In this manner she executed not only the customary geometric eccentrics, but also landscapes and figures, azure seas and skies, emerald trees, and vivid Flemish houses. Her masterpiece was a large composition to hang over the fire-place, in which the Story of Susannah was represented by deftly laid stitches in silks of many colors; and on this work she labored assiduously when the birth of her artist son was approaching.

While Anthony, the seventh of her twelve children, was passing through the years of childhood, and abiding in the most impressionable period of his life, the good mother continued her embroidery, and worked out cunning designs in multicolored silks. Perhaps she yearned for a child who could exhibit a nobler art than her needle could achieve, and so endeavored to lead Anthony to love and practice designing. Or it may be that the infant, daily surrounded by the charms of form and color, at last attempted to emulate the maternal compositions, and thus attracted his parent’s attention.

Mary Cuypers soon perceived that her son’s instincts were directed towards drawing, and she devoted herself to teaching him in that direction, as far as she was able. And when the child had surpassed his instructor, she persuaded Francis Van Dyck to place him in the studio of Henry Van Balen, a meritorious historical painter, who had been a fellow-disciple with Rubens, and had perfected his art by studying in Italy. According to the registers of the guild, Anthony Van Dyck passed under the tuition of Van Balen in 1609, when he was ten years old.

The glory of Rubens was then rising to its zenith, and speedily inflamed the desire of the ambitious boy to become one of the great master’s pupils. To this end he studied with unremitting diligence, and rapidly mastered the elementary branches, while his eager eyes watched the eagle flight of Rubens’s fame and honor. At the expiration of four or five years he made an attempt to be enrolled among the great master's pupils, and his aspirations were warmly seconded by his sagacious parents. He had the good fortune to meet with the approval of Rubens, who freely admitted him to the studio.

Anthony was not unmindful of the high favor which had been shown him, and his desire to merit this condescension, as well as his love of art, moved him to constant and concentrated labors. The master marked the fruits of his diligence and appreciation, and taught the lad with especial care, enriching his mind with the fruits of his own long experience. He soon promoted him to the duty of making miniature drawings from his own great paintings, which, since they were to be used for the engravers to work upon, needed to reproduce the subtlest expressions of those famous works.

That Van Dyck was highly esteemed by his fellow-pupils, as well as by the master, is proven by the following anecdote. Rubens was accustomed, after the labors of the day were over, to mount his horse and ride out into the country, to unbend the tension of his mind, and to seek fresh sources of inspiration. During these times his pupils would often beg or bribe the old servant Valveken, who guarded the inner painting-room, to admit them to see the works on which the master was engaged. One day, while they were thronging around a freshly painted picture, young Diepenbeck was accidentally pushed against it, and the arm and chin of the Virgin were rubbed out. The young men stood aghast with consternation, and at last Van Hoeck cried out: "Van Dyck is the ablest of us; let him try to repair the damage!" After much hesitation, Anthony set about the work, and in two or three hours he finished it so successfully that even Rubens himself was at first deceived, and believed that it was his own handiwork. When he perceived that another brush than his own had been engaged upon it, he summoned the pupils together, and won from them a frank confession of the accident, with which he was so well pleased and amused that he forthwith forgave the offenders. Descamps affirms that the picture thus repaired was the celebrated 'Descent from the Cross; ' but this can hardly have been possible, since that great painting was delivered to the purchasers when Van Dyck was but thirteen years old. Mensaert says that the picture was that of St. Sebastian, in St. Augustine’s Church at Antwerp.

Early in the year 1618 Van Dyck was received as a franc-maitre of Antwerp, an extraordinary honor for so young an artist. During the same year he joined the society for mutual aid, which had been founded by the artists of the city.

Sir Joshua Reynolds owned a picture which was attributed to Van Dyck in his nineteenth year, representing Rubens, Vosterman, and two other artists. It is said that he also painted, at about the same time, a picture of ‘Christ bearing His Cross,’ for the Dominican Church at Antwerp, and one or two more religious subjects.

In 1623, when the Jesuits of Antwerp were decorating their church with rich ornamentation, they contracted with Rubens for thirty-nine paintings, which he was to design and retouch, the main work on them being done by Van Dyck and the other pupils. The name of the young artist was the only one designated in the contract, as if even then he stood foremost in the band of students. The Jesuit Church was designed by Rubens, and was adorned within by thirty-eight columns of white marble, which had been captured by a Spanish cruiser while being borne on an Algerine ship to Constantinople, to be used in the construction of a mosque. In each of the intervals between the columns one of the new pictures was placed; but the church and most of its contents were destroyed by fire in 1718, and these treasures of art were lost to the world.

During the same year an agent of the Earl of Arundel (whom Rubens entitled "an evangelist to the world of art, and the great supporter of our profession") wrote thus to his master: "Van Dyck lives with Rubens; and his works are beginning to be almost as much esteemed as those of his master. He is a young man of one-and-twenty, with a very rich father and mother in this city; so that it will be difficult to induce him to depart from this country, especially since he sees the fortune which Rubens is acquiring."

Rubens had long been urging his pupil to visit Italy, in the full belief that he would be benefited by the study of the works of the great portrait-painters of the south, and that the contem-

Order-Books of the Exchequer, stating that there was paid "To Anthony Vandike the some of £100 by way of reward for speciall service by him pformed for his Majestie." This sum may have been a gratuity, or else, as some suppose, it may have been the reward for the full-length portrait of James I., which is now at Windsor Castle. It is also believed that Van Dyck painted, at this time, a small portrait of the Earl of Arundel in armor. But it does not appear that he met with sufficient encouragement to induce him to prolong the sojourn in England, since early in 1621 the Privy Council granted "A passe for Anthonie Van Dyck gent his Maties Servaint to travaile for 8 Months he havinge obtayned his Maties leave in that behalf." Herein it appears that the artist was enrolled among the dependents of the royal household, probably in some nominal office secured by Lord Arundel. The period of his absence was also limited, but it is not known that he returned to England until several years later, during the reign of Charles I.

In 1622 Van Dyck was invited to the Hague, by Frederick of Nassau, the Prince of Orange, and abode in the picturesque capital of Holland for several months. At this time he painted the portraits of the Prince and Princess, and other notable personages, including the armor-clad warriors the Duke of Brunswick and the Count of Mansfeld. The valiant duke had just suffered amputation of his left fore-arm, which had been shattered at the battle of Fleurus, and the artist skillfully concealed the mutilation by painting a scarf over his armor on that side. The date of Van Dyck’s visit to the Hague is not stated, but it must have been before he went to Italy, since both Brunswick and Mansfeld died while he was absent in that country.

When Van Dyck was passing through Haarlem, he desired to see Franz Hals, the celebrated painter, but was unable to find him at home, since he preferred the smoky chambers of the taverns and the merry orgies of his boon companions to the quiet life of the studio. At last some one found the joyous artist, and summoned him home. Van Dyck introduced himself as an amateur, who wanted his portrait painted, but had only two hours in which to sit for it. Whereupon Hals seized the first canvas at hand, and fairly rained his brush-strokes upon it, so that, at the expiration of the time, he exclaimed: “Have the goodness to rise, sir, and examine your portrait.” Van Dyck praised it warmly, and conversed for some time upon art, carefully avoiding all technical terms, and finally said: “Painting seems a very easy thing. I’d like to try what I could do at it.” He took up a bare canvas, and Hals sat down in his turn, while the visitor dipped his brush in the colors, and finished a portrait as soon as Hals had done. The latter was astounded at his expedition, and when he saw the canvas, he cried: “You are certainly Van Dyck; he alone is capable of such work.” Then he embraced the great artist, and welcomed him to the studio. The visitor gave the Hals children several ten-florin pieces, but it was not long ere their father had invested them at the tavern.

There is a picture by Van Dyck, now in the Louvre, in which King David, St. John, and St. Catherine are seen adoring the Virgin and Child; and duplicates are in the Baring collection and the Berlin Museum. An ancient tradition states that the King David and the Virgin were portraits of the artist’s father and mother, while the St. Catherine was his mistress and the St. John was his own face. ‘The Adoration of the Shepherds,’ in the De Grey collection, contains another portrait of the master, as one of the shepherds, apparently about twenty-five years old.

Van Dyck was recalled to Antwerp by the mortal illness of his father, and arrived in time to comfort his last hours. The dying man made his son promise to paint a picture for the Dominican Sisters, who had solaced his last days on earth. On the 1st of December he expired, and was buried in the Cathedral. Seven years later the artist finished this picture, and gave it to the sisterhood. It was a Crucifixion, with Sts. Catherine and Dominic near by; and on a rock at the foot of the cross was painted the following bizarre sentiment, in Latin: "Lest the earth should be heavy upon the remains of his father, Anthony Van Dyck moved this rock to the foot of the Cross, and gave it to this place." The picture was sold at auction in 1785, when the monasteries were broken up, and was bought in for the Antwerp Academy for $2,700.

Descamps suggests that Rubens entertained an extreme jealousy towards Van Dyck at this time, and endeavored to prevent a competition by advising him to ignore historical painting and devote himself to portraiture. This theory is sufficiently absurd when we consider the youth of Van Dyck, and his barrenness of master works; while such a suspicion is equally repulsed by the noble and magnanimous character of Rubens, and his liberal and joyous acknowledgment of the genius of his contemporaries. Some ingenious Frenchman has supposed (more Gallicano) that the master was moved by jealousy of a sharper kind, and that he wished to remove his handsome young pupil from the vicinity of Madame Rubens, the obese Isabella.

It is, indeed, probable that the master advised his pupil, frankly and generously, as to the line of effort in which he appeared most skillful, and wherein he might hope for the highest honors. This was portraiture, and the accuracy of Rubens's judgment was proven by the preeminent success which his pupil achieved in that department. Furthermore, the master held portraiture as one of the highest vocations of art, and the point of its closest emulation with nat-
In Rubens's house, after his death, were found copies of twenty of Titian's portraits, executed by himself.

When Van Dyck paid his farewell visit to his beloved master, he presented him with three pictures from his own hand, an Ecce Homo, a portrait of Madame Rubens, and a representation of the Romans seizing Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane. The last named was so highly appreciated by Rubens that he gave it an honorable place in the principal chamber of his house, and frequently extolled its many merits. He returned his pupil's generosity by presenting to him one of the finest horses in his stable; perhaps the same one copied in the equestrian portrait of Rubens which Van Dyck made before he departed to the South.

Van Dyck was now ready to take his journey into Italy, when a new complication arose to detain him, threatening also to put a permanent end to his advance in art. He was always an ardent admirer of the fair sex, and halted at no sacrifice to win their smiles. It happened, therefore, that while he was traversing the route from Antwerp to Brussels, as he approached the latter city, he stopped at the hamlet of Saventem, situated in a fair valley of Flanders. Now near this village was the rural home of Anna Van Ophem, whom all accounts declare to have been one of the fairest of women, though the romancing biographers call her a peasant girl, and graver chroniclers give her a higher rank, saying that she bore the singular honorary title of keeper of the Archduchess's dogs, and that the house near Saventem was only her rural villa. However this may be, whether smitten with the charms of a boor's daughter, or renewing a previous friendship with a court lady, the handsome young cavalier turned aside from his journey, and dallied for many a week in the lovely environs of Saventem, wandering through the fragrant fields and sauntering by the placid streams with the fair enchantress. He abandoned all thought of Italy, and even laid aside his pencil, until Anna persuaded him to paint a picture for the village church. The resulting composition was a Holy Family, in which the Virgin was a portrait of Anna herself, while St. Joachim and St. Anna were drawn from her parents. The picture has long since disappeared, and Mensaert says that the Louvre until 1815, the beloved St. Martin was restored to the Saventhem Church. About the year 1850 a rich American (so says Michielis) offered $20,000 for the picture, no matter how it might be obtained, and the enterprising rogues to whom he had applied attempted to steal it at night. But the watch-dogs gave the alarm, and the men of Saventhem rushed to the church so quickly that the robbers had barely time to save themselves. Since that time a guardian sleeps in the church.

After his return from Italy the artist once more saw Anna Van Ophem, but her fascination was then gone, and he painted her portrait surrounded by the Archduchess's dogs, each of which has its name written below. This picture was in Tervueren Castle, near Brussels, as late as 1763.

But during these Arcadian weeks Rubens had heard that his whilom pupil had paused on his journey, and that the caresses of a rustic maid were supplanting all his high ambition of art. So he hastened to urge him, by all inducements of future grandeur and renown, to tear himself from the arms of his Armida, and to throw off his dangerous infatuation. He also sent the Chevalier Nanni to Saventhem, to add his remonstrances and exhortations, and to stimulate in him a passion for Italy. Michielis deplores Rubens's conduct and thinks not only that Van Dyck needed not the instruction of Italy, but also that it was a sad bargain when he thus exchanged love for glory. The urgency of his politic and practical friends at last had their effect; and, bidding farewell to Anna, he took the route to Italy. Rubens equipped him also with numerous letters of introduction to the wealthy nobles and skillful artists whom he himself had known during his long and profitable abode beyond the Alps.
CHAPTER II.

Van Dyck in Italy.—Studies Titian.—Life at Venice and Genoa.
—At Rome and Palermo.

So the young Antwerper crossed the Alps, and as soon as he approached the land sacred to art he turned his steps to Venice, to observe the magic coloring of those famous artists whose works had influenced the florid brush of Rubens. In the city of the lagoons he made a long sojourn, giving the closest study to the great pictures of Titian, Giorgione, and the other Venetian masters, analyzing their methods, and copying several of the paintings with earnest care. The most profitable season of Van Dyck’s five years in Italy was that which he thus spent, wherein he attained a manner more elevated and refined than he had learned in Brabant, and caught some of the richness and mellowness of the Titian-esque coloring. The assiduity of his labors here is attested by his sketch-books, two of which were lately owned by Agar Ellis, and contained to practice this branch of art, and received assurances of numerous commissions. The marvelous mastery which he had attained over Titian's favorite carnations, which he used more skillfully than Rubens himself, insured his success among the Venetians, who were, indeed, Oriental in their love of deep, rich colors. The reverent manner in which the fair-haired northern artist studied the works of the master of Cadore was strongly contrasted by Jervase, a century later, who fancied that he could surpass Titian; and when he had finished a copy of one of that great master's works, which he thought superior even to the original, he exclaimed: "Poor little Tit! How he would stare!"

Van Dyck continued this interesting analysis until his purse was empty, with prodigal living, and it became necessary to earn money for further support. Recalling the brilliant success which Rubens had enjoyed at Genoa thirteen years before, he directed his steps to that city, where he was favorably received by the noble families who still remembered the notable achievements of his master. His own elegant manners and fair northern beauty disposed them still more in his favor, and commissions flowed in upon him abundantly. The Balbi, Pallavicini, Raggi, Spinola, and Brignole families gave him a rich patronage, and some of his noblest portraits are still preserved in the Genoese palaces. Among these works, instinct with chivalric refinement and ideal nobility, were equestrian portraits of Giulio Brignole and Gio. Paolo Balbi; the Doge Pallavicino, in his ambassadorial robes; the Marquis Spinola, in armor of polished steel; and a youth of the Imperiale family. The last-named picture was purchased by Queen Christina of Sweden and carried to Rome.

The noble portraits of Senator Balbi and his wife are enriched by the solemn coloring and magistral dignity of Titian's own pencil, combined with perfect drawing. They were purchased from the Balbi Palace by Sir David Wilkie, and entered Sir Robert Peel's collection. The famous 'White Boy' is still in the Durazzo Palace, and represents a patrician lad of the Durazzo family, clad in white satin. Another Genoese portrait was that of the Marchioness of Durazzo, robed in yellow silk, and attended by her two daughters, one of whom wore blue silk braided with gold. The manner of the local artists was closely followed in this picture, and also in 'The White Boy.' Among the other pictures painted for this princely family were a Virgin and Child and a composition representing Coriolanus receiving his mother and children in the camp of the Volsci.

The equestrian portrait of the Marquis of Brignole, a noble youth on a gray charger, and the smaller picture of his marchioness, robed in dark blue silk embroidered with gold, are still preserved in the Brignole Palace at Genoa, together with several other works by the same hand, including 'The Tribute Money,' which strongly recalls the manner of Titian.

The portrait of Walgenstein dates from 1624, and is now in the Lichtenstein Palace at Vienna, which is so rich in the master's pictures. In the same collection are the portraits of the armor-clad Prince of Nassau, and the martial Prince Ferdinand, the Governor of the Low Countries. In 1625 Van Dyck painted a portrait of Nicholas Rockox, an Antwerp magnate who seems to have been traveling in Italy at this time. This picture for many years adorned the Hall of Assembly at Antwerp.
While he was in Genoa Van Dyck painted that excellent portrait of himself which is now in the Duke of Grafton's collection, showing a blonde-haired youth dressed in a robe of black silk and a purple vest. The famous picture of the Lomellini family, now at Edinburgh, was his chief work in Genoa, and is about nine feet square. Another portrait at Edinburgh was purchased from the Gentili family, and was one of Anthony's Genoese works. Numerous other pictures of this period have been picked up in Italy, and are now worthily enshrined in British palaces.

The master dwelt at Genoa for about three years, at different times, and executed an astonishing number of portraits and other pictures, manifesting a remarkable facility in handling, and a tireless energy; while the rare skill with which he caught the expressions of his sitters was prophetic of his subsequent triumphs in portraiture. But the Genoese pictures are not equal in merit to those of the periods preceding and following, since they have in later times deteriorated in color, and assumed a dark and sombre appearance. It has been suggested that he used the brown tints, then favored by the local artists, in compliment to the Genoese, who had so liberally employed him, and whom he thought to please by adopting the national manner of coloring.

After his first successes at Genoa, the master yearned to visit Rome, the home of the noblest triumphs of art, whose temples had won a new consecration from the genius of Angelo and Raphael. Upon his arrival in the Eternal City he was domiciled in the palace of Cardinal Bentivoglio, who had formerly been the papal nuncio to Flanders, and had then acquired a strong affection for the Flemish people. Bentivoglio commissioned him to make a picture of the Crucifixion; and he also painted a full-length portrait of the Cardinal, which is still preserved in the Florentine Gallery, and ranks among the master's best works, being instinct with the life of Venetian color. This portrait of the famous historian and the confidant of Urban VIII. bears the date of 1623, and combines nobility and dignity with animation and elegance, showing a masterly execution. The stately prelate is seated, in his cardinal's robes, near a table, on which there is a vase of flowers and a letter. A century later
John Smybert copied this portrait, and his copy, hung in one of the halls of Harvard College, excited the artistic sympathies of the youths Jonathan Trumbull and Washington Allston, who copied it in their turn.

During the same period the young artist painted 'The Ascension' and 'The Adoration of the Magi,' which were afterwards enshrined in the Quirinal Palace. He also executed portraits of Sir Robert Shirley and his wife, which are now at Petworth Castle. That worthy English knight had married a lady of the Persian royal family, and was at this time acting as the envoy of the Shah at the court of Pope Gregory XV., from whom he was soliciting aid against the Turks.

Van Dyck remained at Rome from 1623 until the end of 1624, according to Soprani's account, and painted many pictures, which are still preserved in the Colonna, Corsini, and other palaces. He would doubtless have continued much longer in the city but for the hostility of the resident Flemish artists, whose drunken revels and gross pleasures were thoroughly distasteful to this apostle of a new and purer school. They were offended at his withdrawal from their tavernings, and affected to regard his knightly manners and dress as the marks of an inordinate pride and self-conceit. It is, indeed, certain that he conducted and costumed himself so ostentatiously that the Romans called him Il pittore cavalieresco. The main cause of the master's troubles seems to have been his abrupt and perhaps contemptuous refusal to be present at a gluttonous supper of initiation, which the Flemish artists usually gave to every new fellow-professional who arrived in the city. A powerful cabal was formed against him, and his works were disparaged as incorrect in drawing and feeble in color. These petty machinations so far disgusted him that he resolved to depart from their contaminating presence, and avoid such a profitless conflict.

His first sojourn was at Genoa, but he abode there only a short time. He soon departed for Sicily, in company with the Chevalier Nanni, and went to Palermo, where he painted a portrait of Philibert of Savoy, the Viceroy of the island. He also portrayed the celebrated female artist, Sofonisba Angosciola, who was then nine-

Soon afterwards he met the Countess of Arundel, who was then traveling in Italy, and attended her as far as Turin, but declined her urgent request that he should continue the journey to England. Returning to the patronage of the Genoese nobles, and the cheerful hospitalities of his countryman, Cornelius de Wael (whose portrait he painted), he abode there for some time longer. He also visited Florence, and executed a few pictures there, enjoying, meanwhile, the friendship of Justus Sustermans, the celebrated Flemish portrait-painter and artist to the Tuscan court. It is believed that he wandered to Milan and Brescia; and the Cathedral of Fano contains a portrait of one of the Rainalducci family, painted by him.

It is thought that the noble portrait of the Duchess of Savoy, now in Lord Aberdeen's collection, was made at Turin, when Van Dyck was in that city. She is a brown-haired lady, erect and stately, and clad in robes richly embroidered with gold lace. The Duke Charles Emanuel of Savoy was also depicted, armor-clad and decorated with the Order of the Immaculate

Towards the close of the year 1626 Van Dyck returned to his native country, after an absence of over four years. The memory of his former achievements and of his recent successful career in Italy secured for him a warm reception, but the overshadowing fame of Rubens was so vast that it left but a secondary place for his former pupil. Indeed, Van Dyck found it difficult, for a time, to get any contracts, and remained almost without occupation. The elder Teniers once met him in the street, and said: "Well, how are your affairs now? Do the people begin to appreciate your works? Do you get any commissions?" To whom Van Dyck made answer: "I have hardly had time yet, being so lately arrived from Italy. But I certainly could be treated with more consideration. Do you see that fat brewer, who is now passing us? I offered to portray his lumpy face for two pistoles, and he laughed at me, and said that my prices were too high. I assure you that I shall not remain long in this city unless the wind changes.”

At last a member of the Confraternity of the Virgin commissioned the master to paint an ‘Adoration of the Shepherds’ for the Church of Notre Dame at Dendermonde; and when it was finished the brethren esteemed that the contract price, four hundred florins, was too much. The impecunious artist was forced to beg his patron to take the picture, and gave with it a portrait of the brother himself. The painting was ultimately bequeathed to the confraternity, and the portrait remained in the family of its subject, though four thousand florins was offered for it.

By these and similar mischances, and the slowness of public recognition of his merits, the master was filled with chagrin, and well-nigh brought to necessity. Rubens was the principal, though unwitting, cause of his troubles, and to him the distressed artist made urgent complaint. The very next day the old master went to Van Dyck’s studio, and, after speaking very cheerily to him, purchased all the paintings which he then had finished. Rubens retained ten of his great disciple's pictures as long as he lived. Houbraken and Descamps state that Rubens gave a further proof of his respect by offering his daughter in marriage to Van Dyck, but that the latter declined the flattering proposal, since he was already smitten with a hopeless love for her mother. Michielis, however, characterizes this anecdote as "sovereignly curious," because at that time Rubens had no daughter, while his wife had died before Van Dyck returned from Italy.

In 1628 the sunshine of prosperity broke over the path of our artist, when the Augustinian monks gave him an order for an altar-piece for their church. This great work represents St. Augustine in ecstasy, sustained by angels, and looking into heaven at the three Persons of the Godhead. The majestic picture falls short of its highest effect by reason of the lack of a large mass of light, and Reynolds severely criticised it on that ground. But this fault was not perceived when the work was first completed, since the artist had formed his main light by draping the saint and the angels in light-colored robes.
The prior, however, reminded him that the robes of the Augustinians were black, and said: "No one could recognize the founder of our order in your white-robed saint, so you must either blacken his garments, or else keep the picture yourself." The artist bewailed the necessity, but complied; and was then informed that the convent treasury was empty, and he must wait for his pay. It was not until he had painted another picture ("The Crucifixion"), and presented it to the monks, that he received the six hundred florins which were his due.

From this time Van Dyck's position was secure, and he was kept continually engaged on honorable and lucrative commissions. In some degree this activity was due to the frequent absences of Rubens, who spent much of the next few years on diplomatic missions from the Archduchess Isabella to the courts of London and Madrid. Descamps enumerates upwards of thirty pictures which Van Dyck painted, during this period, for the churches and public buildings of the Low Countries.

Other pictures of this period were 'The Crucifixion' for St. Michael's Church at Ghent, a magnificent work, which is now nearly destroyed by cleansing and restoration; and 'The Crucifixion' which is now in Mechlin Cathedral. The latter, showing Christ on the Cross, between the two thieves, and a Murillo-like Madonna, was characterized by Sir Joshua Reynolds as "upon the whole one of the first pictures in the world, and gives the highest idea of Van Dyck's power; it shows that he had truly a genius for history painting, if it had not been taken off by portraits." About the same time, the master also painted a corporation picture, containing the portraits of twenty-three magistrates of Brussels, as they sat in council. This curious work was destroyed in 1695, during the bombardment of Brussels.

'The Marriage of St. Catherine' is a composition wherein the Infant Jesus places a ring on the finger of the saint, while the Virgin crowns her with flowers. So superlative are the beauties and divine expressions of the Virgin and Child that this picture has long been called La plus belle des Vierges. It was brought from Brussels to England in 1820, and sold to the King, for 2,500 guineas. Another splendid work, which passed from Brussels to Windsor, was the 'Christ Healing the Paralytic,' a broad and vigorous composition, which for many years passed for Rubens's.

One of the most tender and beautiful compositions of the master was 'The Infant Saviour Crowning St. Rosalie,' a large and richly-colored picture which was painted for the hall of the Congregation of Jesuits at Antwerp. It was afterwards carried to Prague, and is now in the Vienna Belvedere. The Munich Gallery contains two more of Van Dyck's pictures of the same saint, showing the appearance of the Holy Trinity to her, and her transportation to heaven by angels. Another fine picture painted for the Jesuits' hall (and now at the Belvedere), was The Virgin Appearing to St. Hermanus.'

The magnificent 'Ecce Homo,' now at Potsdam, was closely based on Titian's picture of the same subject, which is now in the Louvre. This fine work of Van Dyck's was copied in an engraving of Langot's, of the extraordinary dimensions of seven feet by five. The 'Ecce Homo' and large pictures of 'St. John the Baptist' and 'St. John the Evangelist' were painted for the Ladies' Church at Bruges, and were purchased by the King of Prussia from the Bruges Academy, in 1755, for 20,000 florins. Another picture wherein Titian was closely followed, at least as far as copying the head, was the magnificent equestrian portrait of the Emperor Charles V., which is now in the Uffizi Gallery.

For the Recollet Church, at Antwerp, Van Dyck painted excellent pictures of the 'Marriage of St. Catherine' and 'The Entombment of Christ.' The Recollets of Mechlin were also liberal patrons, and had the master paint, for their church, the famous Crucifixion between two thieves, besides pictures of St. Bonaventure and St. Anthony.

The Capuchin monks of Brussels received from Van Dyck pictures of St. Francis and St. Anthony of Padua, which reverted to the Brussels Museum when the convents were closed. Even little Dendermond had her master-pieces by Van Dyck, 'The Adoration of the Shepherds' and 'Christ Expiring on the Cross,' which were enshrined in the parish church. The last named was carried to Paris by Napoleon's art-foragers, and was returned to the village-altar after the peace which was won at Waterloo.
Lille also was highly honored by the pictures of the great master, and here again the Recollet monks seem to have been the chief agents in securing these noble works. Their church was adorned with his compositions, representing 'The Assumption of the Virgin,' 'St. Anthony,' and 'The Crucifixion,' all of which have disappeared since the monasteries were closed. 'The Dying Saviour,' formerly in this convent, and now in the Lille Museum, is one of Van Dyck's noblest achievements, in which he gives the fullest expression to his hatred of evil and injustice. In this trait the master has been called the foremost of modern artists, and the most eloquent and powerful of the men who protested in color against the iniquities which seem to rule the world. The face and figure of the dying Christ appear like those of Prometheus, filled with agonizing protest against the triumphs of darkness and the unjust torments which fall upon the just and innocent. The two Maries, at the foot of the Cross, are overpowered by the deepest distress, and look, in their desolation, upon the piteous expiring victim.

'The Entombment of Christ' was the theme of several of Van Dyck's grandest and most solemn compositions, wherein he shows the intensity of the grief and despair of those whom Christ left behind him. The Munich Gallery contains two of these, which have often been engraved; and others are at Vienna and Antwerp, and in England. One of the best illustrations of this theme was painted for the church of the Beguine Nunnery, in which two of the artist's sisters had taken the veil. For the Facontine Convent, wherein his sister Anna was a nun, he painted a 'Holy Family.' At Vilvorde, the Hospital of Religious Women had a composition of the Virgin and Child appearing to St. Anthony of Padua.

During the same period the master executed many of his best portraits, including those of the Cardinal-Infante and the Archduchess Isabella; equestrian portraits of the Duke of Alva, the Duke of Arenberg, and Prince Thomas of Savoy; the Bishop of Ghent and the Abbé Scaglia; and Marie de Medicis, the Queen-Mother of France, and her son, the Duke of Orleans, both of whom had fled to Brussels to escape the plots of Richelieu. He also made many of the exquisite sketches en grisaille, of the most renowned men of the time, in letters, arts, or arms, which were engraved by Martin van den Enden. The Duke of Buccleuch now possesses the portraits of thirty-seven eminent artists and others of the seventeenth century, executed in brown and white, and made by Van Dyck for engravers to work from. These pictures were afterwards in the collection of Sir Peter Lely. They were destined to be used in the famous book called "Centum Icones;" and are each about nine and one half by seven and one half inches in size. Blanc says that in these, above all his works, Van Dyck should be studied, since he here shows an unwonted originality, fearlessness, and enthusiasm. A few of them have been scattered into other collections besides that of Buccleuch. Of these pictures, thirty were engraved by Paul Pontius, whose delicate and graceful works fairly represented their great originals. Twenty more were engraved by Vorsterman, with equal skill and insight.

In 1627 and 1628 the master painted the two exquisite portraits now in the Hague Gallery, representing a young lady and a gentleman in the wherein he appears as about forty-five years old. Another, taken about five years earlier, and now in the Duke of Buccleuch's collection, has been engraved eight times. A small and spirited painting en grisaille shows Rubens and Van Dyck in the same picture, surrounded by emblems and allegories, and overlooked by Minerva and Mercury. This was painted for and engraved by Paul Pontius. In the National Gallery there is an interesting picture by Van Dyck, of three persons, discoursing on art, and the principal figure is incorrectly called Rubens. Edmund Burke told Angerstein that this was Sir Joshua Reynolds's favorite picture, and certainly it was given an honorable place in his collection. Rubens's portrait was introduced by Van Dyck as the head of the Emperor Theodosius, in the great picture which he made of the historic scene between that sovereign and St. Ambrose, the Archbishop of Milan, wherein the latter excluded the Roman chief from Milan Cathedral. The picture was an adaptation from a similar composition by Rubens himself; and is now in the British National Gallery.

Cornelius vander Geest was a celebrated Flemish amateur who was on intimate terms with both Rubens and Van Dyck, the former of whom painted for him the grand picture of 'The Battle of the Amazons,' while the latter immortalized his features in one of the finest portraits in the world. This work, which Mrs. Jameson calls "the wonder and despair of modern portrait painters," is in the British National Gallery, where it is erroneously called 'Gevartius.' It was so highly esteemed by the artist himself, that he used to carry it about as a specimen of his utmost skill.

There are several portraits of the Prince Palatine, from Van Dyck's hand. The magnificent equestrian picture of the Duke of Arenberg, a noble Flemish chieftain, was ordered by the Prince Palatine, and represents the Duke clad throughout in armor, mounted on a bay charger, with a march of cavalry in the background.

John Breughel's portrait, now at Munich, was painted by his friend and comrade Van Dyck; and five etchings were made of him and his brother, who were called, in compliment to their proficiency in their respective departments of painting, Hell Breughel and Velvet Breughel.
Another artist-friend and co-laborer was Francis Snyders, whose portrait now adorns the Munich Gallery, and has been twice engraved. He also depicted Snyders with his wife and child, in a handsome picture which is now at St. Petersburg. Two portraits of Paul de Vos, the game painter, and his wife, have now been widely separated by the chances of picture sales. Other subjects were, Colin de Noli and Fiammingo, the sculptors; Van Ertvelt, the marine painter; Peter Snayers, Lucas Van Uden, and Palamedes. Henry Liberti was a celebrated organist of that period, and no less than four fine portraits of him were made by the master.

The canon Antonio de Tassis was a distinguished artistic amateur of Antwerp, whom Van Dyck portrayed in his black robes, holding his forefinger between the leaves of a book. The picture is now in the Lichtenstein Gallery together with that of the fair Maria Louisa de Tassis, in a rich silk robe with white satin bodice and sleeves, trimmed with gold cord, and adorned with precious stones.

The venerable Malderus, Bishop of Antwerp, also sat to Van Dyck, and the results were the two fine portraits now in Windsor Castle and the Antwerp Academy, wherein the shepherd of the hard-won Catholic fold by the Scheldt is robed in his full ecclesiastical costume. Another illustrious churchman, the Abbé Scaglia, Spanish commissioner to the Treaty of Munster, was the theme of one of the master's finest productions, in which the venerable diplomat is portrayed in the robe and bands of his profession, and leans gracefully against the plinth of a column.

The Duke of Nassau and his wife and four children formed the subjects of a large portrait-group, clad in the richest garments, and arranged in a stately vestibule. This is the painting, now in England, which Dr. Waagen calls the most magnificent family-picture in the world.

The Archduchess Isabella was portrayed by Van Dyck several times, but always in the dress of a religious order of which she was the abbess. These have often been engraved by skillful burins. Two other princesses of the House of Austria were painted in the habit of the Carmelites of the Royal Convent, and the picture is now at Madrid. One of these was the Infanta Donna Margarita. The Infante Don Ferdinand, brother of Philip IV. of Spain, was depicted on horseback, clad in armor, and attended by an angel sent to destroy the rebel armies.

The beautiful Margaret of Lorraine, Princess of Phalsbourg, frequently enlisted Van Dyck’s pencil to portray her aristocratic features. The finest of these portraits are the full-length pictures now at Florence and in Lord Carlisle’s collection, which are rich in delineations of jewels, silks, and white satin.

In those days the tombs of persons of consequence, inside the churches, were frequently adorned with pictures of the deceased. Among Van Dyck’s works of this class were portraits of Marie Anne Schoten, for St. Gudule’s Church at Brussels: John Snellincks, the favorite battle-painter of the Spanish Governors, for St. George’s Church, at Antwerp; and Henri Van Balen and his wife, at St. Jaques Church. The tomb of Waresguiel, in a rural Flemish church, was adorned by Van Dyck’s painting of ‘The Seven Acts of Mercy,’ executed in 1629, and introducing the artist’s own portrait and nineteen figures.

One of the finest works painted by Van Dyck
prior to his departure for England, was 'The Elevation of the Cross,' executed on the order of the canons of St. Martin's Church, at Courtrai. He exerted himself to the utmost on this picture, in order to establish his reputation at home, and to silence the detractions of his inferiors, by producing a perfect masterpiece. He succeeded in this endeavor, and the new production was visited and highly commended by the foremost artists and critics of the Low Countries. Numerous spicy stories have been current for centuries about the contumelious treatment which the artist received from the unappreciative canons, and how he at last became even with them. But the latest and best authorities regard the accounts of this disagreement as pure fictions, and give extracts from Van Dyck's letters to show in what high esteem he held and was held by the Courtrai ecclesiastics.

Michielis calls this picture "one of the most admirable chefs-d'œuvre that the art of painting has ever produced;" and finding therein an index of the difference between Rubens and Van Dyck, holds the latter as superior in poetic sentiment, profound thought, harmonious sweetness, and noble elegance. Rubens excels in masterly unity, inexhaustible originality, and unbroken harmony of conception and execution, differing therein from the other, whose style was influenced by his various surroundings, now of Venetian art and now of the Lowland colorists, and by the restrictions and exactions of the insular nobles. Rubens was the inventor and greatest master of a new manner, which his illustrious pupil in some regards improved and spiritualized. Mengs has recorded an opinion that Van Dyck excelled even Correggio in delicacy.

Shall we follow Michielis in his translation of Van Dyck's motives in his religious paintings? If we do, we shall see the faces of the martyrs turned toward the skies with looks of reproach and anger, abnegation and humility alike forgotten, and replaced by a reckless scorn. We shall see the artist covertly reproaching Heaven for the deluge of blood which, in the name of the Prince of Peace, had flowed over Germany and the Netherlands; and glaring insolently at Him that sitteth on the Throne, through the eyes of His elect martyrs. Elsewhere the critic finds brilliant and true, and the draperies show the fairest and most befitting colors. More substantial than the spirit-like Umbrian Madonnas or the ineffable Spanish Mothers of God, Van Dyck's Virgins are far more refined and saintly than those of Rubens, and are etherealized as far as the North Sea parishes would care to have them. One of the most exquisite of these is now at Bridgewater House, and exhibits the rich and brilliant colors of Titian, in combination with chaste design and divine expression. A duplicate is at Dulwich College. Four engravings have been made from this rare picture. Eighteen other Madonnas by Van Dyck are still preserved in well-known collections, and bear the same tender and humanistic traits.

The two magnificent pictures of the dead Christ, in the Antwerp Museum, appear to have been executed in Van Dyck's third decade, one in Italy, under the influence of Titian's warm and sombre coloring, the other in the North, when Rubens's manner was in the ascendant.

While Van Dyck was thus adorning his native land with the rich fruits of his genius, his rivals in art were assailing him on all sides, and defam-ing his character. His old studio-comrades public-licly ridiculed his manner of painting, and gave ludicrous descriptions of his peculiar usage of the implements of art. He was not injured abroad by these attacks, but his peace was greatly troubled by their continual recurrence. Having no desire to combat such opponents, and being unable to endure their malice, he resolved to depart from his native land, and seek rest under other skies.

One of the last misadventures which the master encountered in his native land was at the palace of the Bishop, who had summoned him to make his portrait. Sending his painting implements to the care of the porter, the artist presented himself before the prelate, who was reposing his colossal limbs on a green velvet sofa, and scarcely deigned to notice his presence. "Are you not come to make my portrait?" cried the burly ecclesiastic, after Van Dyck had coolly returned his insolent stare, and helped himself to a chair. "I am at Your Eminence's service," answered he. "But why don't you go and get your implements?" said the Bishop: "Do you think that I shall bring them for you?" To whom the painter calmly replied: "Since you have not ordered your servants to bring them to me, I inferred that you wished to render me that service yourself." Whereupon the angry churchman leaped up, and cried: "Anthony, Anthony, you are only a little asp, but you contain a great deal of venom." The artist hastened to the door, lest the sanctimonious giant should crush him, and, when he reached the threshold, sent back a parting shot: "My lord Van der Burch, you are a voluminous personage, but you resemble the tree which produces the cinnamon. The bark is the best part of you."
CHAPTER IV.

England had not yet developed an art-school of her own, but was prodigal of welcomes to the artists of the Continent. Nearly a century before Van Dyck's birth, Jan van Mabuse, the friend of Albert Dürer and Lucas van Leyden, had visited the court of Henry VII., and met a favorable reception. The Eighth Harry invited Raphael and Primaticcio to London, and when he could not get them, he secured the services of Luca Penni, Raphael's pupil, and other Italians, with Cornelisz and several miniaturists. The bluff old Hans Holbein also abode in England at this time, and received a goodly pension. During the reign of Bloody Mary and her Spanish husband, Philip, several pictures were painted by Titian for the latter, and arrived at London. The Emperor Charles V. also sent Antonio More to Mary's court, where he stayed a few years. Queen Elizabeth had no interest in art, but during her long and prosperous reign the first English painters of any note arose, bearing the now almost forgotten names of Cooper and Hillyard. James I. allowed the arts to take their own course, without any help or hindrance from his blundering attentions; but his nobles began the first collections of pictures in Great Britain, and Arundel and Buckingham were generous protectors of artists. Between 1606 and 1620 the skillful portrait-painters Paul Vansomer, Cornelis Janssen, and Daniel Mytens came over from the Netherlands, finding munificent patrons among the British nobles, and meeting with no competition from the inferior insular artists. When the reign of the cold bigot, James I., had ended, and the generous and art-loving Charles had ascended the throne, many of the Lowland painters looked toward London as the field of their future emolument. Jan Lievens, Rembrandt's fellow-pupil; Gerard Terburg, the inimitable painter of satins; Gerard Honthorst, Caravaggio's imitator, whom the Italians called dalle Notte; Cornelius Poelemburg, the author of dainty landscapes; and Henry Steenwyck, a proficient in architectural painting,—all these were welcomed and well paid by King Charles. The resplendent works of Rubens had created a high appreciation of the Flemish school of painting, and a desire to possess some of its noble works. King Charles ennobled Rubens, and tried in various ways to retain him at court, but in vain, for the princely artist preferred to dwell among his own people. It was natural that the disappointed sovereign should turn to the next best, and seek to adorn his court with other able Continental artists.

According to the Antwerp Academy catalogue, Van Dyck endeavored to avail himself of this disposition of the British court, and made a visit to London in 1629. Geldorp, a portrait-painter of Antwerp, was living in London at this time, and entertained the new-comer as long as he remained in the city. It seems that he failed to secure any encouragement, or to get an introduction to the King, whereupon he returned to the Continent in deep chagrin. There is a tradition that during this unsuccessful expedition Van Dyck found a generous patron in Henry Percy, the Earl of Northumberland, who had just been released from imprisonment. He took the artist to Petworth, and retained him there for six months, while he painted the portraits of several members of the Percy family, which now adorn the White and Gold Room in that famous mansion. The Earl had fought in the Low Countries and against the Armada, but was afterwards imprisoned in the Tower of London for sixteen years, on suspicion of favoring the Romanists, as his father had also been confined for his sympathy with Mary, Queen of Scots.

After his return, Van Dyck is reported to have visited Paris, where he painted several portraits, including one of M. Chartres, a famous dealer in articles of _vertu_.

Charles, the British sovereign, was not the direct heir to the throne, since his brother Henry was the elder; and the latter once said that when he became king he should make Charles Archbishop of Canterbury. Perhaps in this case the royal house of Stuart would not have gone down, drenched in the blood of its chief and of faithful Scotland. But Henry died, and Charles, the elegant scholar, the versatile amateur, the weak of England, he led a life of feudal reserve, and amused himself chiefly with his collections. The Arundelian Marbles were gathered for him, in Greece and her islands, by William Petty, the uncle of the founder of the famous Lansdowne family. The Earl also purchased many paintings and antique medals from Vanderborcht, Rubens, and other Continental artists; and the great galleries of Arundel House were adorned with thirty-seven statues, one hundred and twenty-eight busts, and two hundred and fifty ancient inscribed marbles. He also developed the genius of Inigo Jones, and introduced the new method of building with brick into London, which had previously been constructed mainly of wood. When the conflict began between the King and the English people, Arundel was sagacious enough to abandon the distracted island, and fled to Antwerp with his collections. He died at Padua; and the treasures which he had accumulated were divided among his heirs, and some part of them eventually came into the possession of Oxford University, where they are still known as the Arundelian Marbles. One of the Earl's favorite schemes was to divert a part of the English emigration, which was so rapidly moving westward across the ocean, and to form a powerful colony in Madagascar. This pet idea was illustrated in one of Van Dyck's portraits of Arundel and his countess, wherein the Earl is seen pointing to the island of Madagascar, on a globe. Several other beautiful portraits of the noble connoisseur are now preserved in England.

The Duke of Buckingham, Arundel's implacable enemy, long held the position of royal favorite, and kept the Earl in retirement. His hostility was the more easily victorious, since Arundel had come under the King's displeasure by allowing his son, Lord Maltravers, to marry Lady Stuart, the daughter of the Duke of Lennox, whom Charles had destined for the bride of Lord Lorne. But when Buckingham died, in 1628, the Earl resumed the position in the royal favor which his congenial disposition and high talents merited. This nobleman was the same who had befriended Van Dyck many years before, and now, at his advice, the King invited the Flemish artist to visit the English court. Bellori relates this circumstance, and states that he derived his information from Sir Kenelm Digby, who was at that time the ambassador of Queen Henrietta Maria of England, to the Pope. The King’s desire to enlist Van Dyck in his service was increased by the sight of a picture of ‘Rinaldo and Armida,’ which was bought in Antwerp for the royal collection by Sir Endymion Porter. This gentleman, a groom of the bedchamber, and colonel of the Seventh Foot Regiment, was beloved by James I. for his admirable wit, and by Charles I. for his learning, wide travels, and sweet temper; and was afterwards outlawed by the Commonwealth’s Parliament. He visited Van Dyck in 1629 and paid seventy-two pounds for the ‘Rinaldo and Armida.’ Afterwards the artist painted a portrait of Porter and his family, which is now owned by Viscount Strangford, and several other portraits of the merry knight himself.

Walpole quotes Mr. Beale’s diary for the cause of the King’s invitation to Van Dyck, which doubtless combined with Arundel’s suggestions to insure the result: “Upon that he [Lely] took occasion to speak of Mr. Nicholas Lanière’s picture of Sr. Anto. V. D., doing which, said he, Mr. Lanière himself told me he satt seaven entire dayes for it to Sr. Anto., and that he painted upon it all of these seven dayes, both morning and afternoon, and only intermitted the time they were at dinner. And he said likewise, that tho' Mr. Lanière satt so often and so long for his picture, that he was not permitted so much as once to see it, till he had perfectly finished the face to his own satisfaction. This was the picture which, being show'd to King Charles the First, caused him to give order that V. Dyck shou’d be sent for over into England.” When the royal collection was broken up, in 1649, Lanière bought this picture. Subsequently Van Dyck painted another portrait of the versatile chapel-master, showing him as David playing the harp before King Saul.

Late in 1631, Sir Balthazar Gerbier, the British minister at Brussels, purchased Van Dyck's picture of the Virgin and St. Catherine, and sent it to London for the Lord-Treasurer Weston to present to the King or Queen, as a New Year's gift. The artist thanked Gerbier for this act, having resolved to take himself also to London again, but afterwards changed his mind, and involved the worthy diplomat in serious perplexities. Anthony even declared that the picture aforesaid was a copy, and not from his own hand; whereupon Rubens became involved in the controversy by asserting that it was surely Van Dyck's work, and suggesting that if he persevered in disowning it "he should be put to the test in order to see if he will do better." The Archduchess Isabella summoned Van Dyck into her presence, and reprimanded him for his fickleness. It is impossible to ascertain the motives of Van Dyck in thus conducting this obscure affair, but it is evident that he was subjected to deep wounds by the reproofs of his old master and his sovereign. The trouble was probably with Gerbier, who appears to have concealed a part of his instructions, and then fiercely denounced the artist to the British court.

Sir Balthazar was the intimate friend of Rubens and Van Dyck, having been originally an artist himself and miniaturist to Charles I., who afterwards knighted him and made him an ambassador. He repudiated his connection with painting, and became an obsequious and successful courtier. Rubens painted his wife and child, and Van Dyck composed a family group consist-ING of Sir Balthazar, his wife, and nine children. The latter was left in Holland until Prince Frederick sent over and bought it for Windsor Castle. Gerbier afterwards went to Surinam, and endeavored to turn the tide of emigration thither from New England by publishing a book entitled “Sir Balthazar Gerbier’s Manifestation of Greater Profits to be done in the Hot than the Cold Parts of America.”

In recounting the artistic tastes of the British King and nobles, the gloomy reverse of the picture must needs be glanced at. Under the Puritan government which succeeded the execution of Charles I., the cause of art suffered deplorable losses, and the victorious Roundheads were not satisfied with the flight of the painters and the cessation of production, but dispersed and even destroyed some of the finest existing collections. In 1645 Parliament voted that all the pictures at York House which included representations of the second Person of the Trinity or of the Virgin Mary should be burnt, and other galleries were gleaned in the same way. A man was hired for half a crown a day to break the great stained windows of Croydon Church. The royal collections were dispersed in every direction, and many of their treasures passed to the Continent. After the Restoration Hugh Peters was examined as to the disposal of these priceless articles, but obstinately refused to divulge their whereabouts, although his execution was near at hand. (This was the same Hugh Peters who was for some years a preacher at Boston, in New England, and used to exhort on the ships anchored in Nantasket Roads.)

in two colors and attributed to his hand. His city residence was one of the buildings which had been erected from the materials and on the site of the great Convent of the Black Friars, after its suppression by Henry VIII. The houses fronted on the Thames, and were thus insured good lights, a circumstance which made them favorite abodes for artists; and they were also more easily accessible to the nobles, who rarely visited the city except in their barges on the river.

Van Dyck was appointed Principal Painter in Ordinary to their Majesties, and Daniel Mytens, “the King’s picture drawer,” was so annoyed by thus being superseded that he begged permission to return to his home at the Hague. Charles kindly said that he could find employment enough for both Van Dyck and him; but he could not endure the new state of affairs, and soon returned to Holland. Cornelis Janssen was another Lowland artist who lived at this time in London, and his studio was also in the Blackfriars.

The court-painter was quickly set to work on most august commissions, and executed a full-length of the King and a half-length of the Queen; and a glorious family picture of the King in his royal robes, with the young Prince Charles at his side, and the Queen with the infant Princess Mary in her arms. This composition is now in the Van-Dyck room at Windsor Castle; and Mrs. Jameson has well remarked that "it is hardly possible, remembering the sorrows and the troublous times which afterwards burst on this devoted family, to look without an emotion of pitying complacency on this representation of domestic happiness, security, and royal dignity, set forth in all the enchanting illusion of art." Duplicates of this work are now owned by the Dukes of Richmond and of Devonshire, and the group of Charles and his son alone is in Lord Normanton's possession.

The courtly manners and chivalric refinement of the Flemish painter made him a great favorite of the King, who conferred the honor of knighthood upon him within three months of the time of his arrival, and presented him with a gold chain, to which was attached the royal portrait set in brilliants. Charles frequently went along the river in his barge, from Whitehall to the Blackfriars, and spent many hours with his artist, watching him while he painted, and hearing his brilliant conversation on the great artworks of Italy and the Continent. Here, at least, he was secure from the boding murmurs of popular discontent, and from the passionate throbblings of the half-rebellious nation.

During his first year in England Van Dyck was fascinated by the beautiful and notorious Lady Venetia, the wife of his friend and patron, Sir Kenelm Digby, and painted as many as four portraits of her. One of these, now at Windsor Castle, is a noble specimen of his skill in its best period, and shows the lady under the attributes of Prudence, with symbolical figures of Deceit, Anger, Envy, and Profane Love bound beneath her feet. The artist made a small duplicate of this composition, for his own possession. In 1633, in her thirty-third year, death suddenly removed this fair but frail daughter of the Stanleys and Percys; and Van Dyck made a beautiful portrait of her lying dead on a couch, with a faded rose beside her. The face has the expression of a tranquil slumber, but its pallor denotes that there shall be no awakening. The picture

Digby was a mystic, a bigoted Catholic, and a haughty placeman. Withal, he was a marvelous traveller and linguist, famous for noble address and personal attractiveness, a profound student, and a daring experimenter in science.

In August, 1632, the King ordered his treasurer to pay Van Dyck two hundred and eighty pounds, for portraits of himself, the French King's brother, and the Archduchess Isabella, at twenty-five pounds each; the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Orange, and their son, at twenty pounds each; the Royal Family, one hundred pounds; the Emperor Vitellius, twenty pounds; and for mending the Emperor Galbus, five pounds. Nine months later he received four hundred and forty-four pounds, for nine portraits of the King and Queen; and several royal orders for similar large sums were issued during the next few years. The Roman Emperor's portrait was to complete a set, the others of which were painted by Titian. At this time the master's prices were twenty pounds for a half-length and twenty-five pounds for a full-length portrait, the relative value of money being then about four times what it is now. In 1638 his prices had risen to thirty pounds for a half-length and fifty pounds for a full-length.

The records of the Exchequer show that the court-painter was constantly employed by the King for the first two years after his arrival; and during the same period he received many lucrative commissions from the foremost nobles of England. In October, 1633, he was favored with the grant of an annual pension of two hundred pounds. But his innate princely tastes had been further developed by familiarity with the splendid establishment of Rubens, and by his residences in the sumptuous palaces of his Italian patrons. He had always been extravagant, and now that means were afforded, his expenditures kept even pace therewith, and he fully indulged his taste for the elegances and refinements of life. He sought to rival even the establishments of the great nobles who lived in London, and surrounded himself with a retinue of servants and the appointments of a patrician household. He gave great feasts to his sitters, in order to study their features when relaxed and in repose; and afterwards retouched their portraits with the natural expressions thus caught. Since he was fond of music, many talented composers and performers frequented the house, and enjoyed his unstinted bounty. The King's visits to the studio made it a favorite resort for the most celebrated wits and nobles of the court, as well as for the fashionable persons of the city, and for people who were seeking the royal patronage.

On one occasion, when the King was in company with Lord Arundel and Van Dyck, the former was speaking to his master about some matters of household expenses, when Charles turned to his painter, and said: "And you, Sir Knight, know you what it is to want three or four thousand pounds?" "Yes, Sire," answered Van Dyck: "He who keeps his house open for his friends, and his purse for his mistresses, will soon find a vacuum in his coffers." He spent great sums on the latter class of parasites, the chief of whom was the famous Margaret Lemon (Sir Endymion Porter's friend), whose portrait by Van Dyck has often been engraved. Besides this portrait, which is at Althorp, he represented her as Judith, in a picture now owned by Lord Waldegrave. She was deeply attached to him, and dwelt in his house at Blackfriars. When he married Miss Ruthven (at the King's command), Margaret was deeply grieved; but her love soon turned to bitter hatred, and she sought a worthy revenge. The tradition gives her credit for the most refined and ingenious wickedness, stating that she attempted to permanently disable him from painting by cutting the cords of his right wrist with a sharp knife. Failing in this, she fled to the Continent, and never returned. The portrait of Mrs. Lemon now at Hampton Court is a grand Titianesque work, wherein the frail beauty appears wrapped in loose crimson drapery.

It is said that Anne Carlisle, who was celebrated for her admirable miniature copies of Italian paintings, was a rival of Margaret Lemon in Sir Anthony's affections. On at least one occasion King Charles linked their names, when he sent to them jointly a present of five hundred pounds' worth of ultramarine. Another lady with whom Sir Anthony became enamored was Catharine Wotton, afterwards Countess of Chesterfield. In 1636 he painted a distinguished portrait of her, reclining on a bank in a pleasant landscape; and another picture showed her in a rich dress of red silk.

In 1635 the master made frequent visits to Holland House, where he portrayed the Earl of Holland, who was executed thirteen years later for heading a revolt against Parliament. About the same time Sir Anthony painted a picture of William Laud, the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose intense bigotry was fatal to his King, and almost as disastrous to his Church, while it enriched New England by thousands of God-fearing exiles. The pious prelate appears in this picture robed in full ecclesiastical garments, with the same calm, firm, and dignified aspect which he wore when he went out to be beheaded on Tower Hill. Archbishop Juxon's portrait, by the same master-hand, is still preserved by the Bishop of London.

Two fine pictures which bear the date of 1636 are the portraits of Justus Merstraeten and his wife, both of whom are robed in black silk. He was a Lowland judge, and stands by a table covered with books. These two pictures were in the Louvre in 1815. Another work of this time was a full-length portrait of the King, standing in his royal robes of dark blue silk lined with ermine, and wearing the collar of St. George.

In 1636 Van Dyck had an engraving made from his portrait of Sir Kenelm Digby, and applied to Francis Junius, the librarian of Lord Arundel, for a fitting motto. He also complimented Junius on his recently published book, "De Pictura Veterum," and spoke of how his friend Baron Conway prized it. This letter is still preserved in the British Museum, and a facsimile is given in Carpenter's memoir of Van Dyck. The master painted a small portrait of Junius, and made an etching of his features.

Thomas Killigrew, the page of Charles I., and afterwards the most caustic wit of the court of Charles II., at this time engaged in a quarrel with Thomas Carew, another court official, and the author of several exquisite lyrics. The two gentlemen had high words together in the presence of Cecilia, Lord Crofts's sister (afterwards Killigrew's wife); and as a memorial of the circumstance Van Dyck was commissioned to paint the picture of the two, which is now preserved at Windsor.

At the close of the year 1638, Van Dyck finished the King's portrait, and presented it to him. He asked two hundred pounds for it, but received only one hundred pounds, for the British King was now already forced to exercise close economy. This noble picture represents the sovereign as lost in the forest while hunting, and he has dismounted from his horse, which is held by two pages. The shadows of the trees fall on the group, and in the distance is an expanse of blue sea, over which a white-winged vessel is speeding. The attitude of the King is most exquisitely chosen; and his face exhibits his ruling traits of moral weakness and martial valor. This picture seems to have been a prophecy of the flight of the unfortunate Charles, and his long and fruitless waiting for a vessel to carry him to France. Indeed, the Countess du Barry afterwards bought it as a representation of that sad event, and hung it in her saloon. When she perceived that the King of France was wavering as to whether he should dissolve the troublesome national assembly, and convene the so-called Maupeou Parliament, she led him before this picture, and bade him look at a sovereign in flight, because he had yielded to his parliament.

One of Sir Anthony's praiseworthy efforts was the founding of a society of artists in London. Scattered in different parts of the city, there was no common meeting-ground for the resident artists, and no possibility of united councils. To remedy this defect, Van Dyck founded the Club of St. Luke, which met at the Rose Tavern, in Fleet Street, and contained all the painters of talent who then inhabited the metropolis. Among these were Janson, of Cologne; Mytens, of the Hague, eleven of whose portraits are at Hampton Court; Adrien Hanneman, also of the Hague, who dwelt in Great Britain for sixteen years, and became the most successful imitator of Van Dyck; Remigius van Leemput, an Antwerper, who ably followed Van Dyck's manner, and lived in London until his death, in 1675; George Jamesone, the Scotchman, who was Van Dyck's fellow student and friend in the studio of Rubens, and was afterwards called "the Van Dyck of Scotland;" and William Dobson, a Londoner, whom Van Dyck had taught with great care, so that he became his successor as painter to the court, and executed some fine portraits. Dobson was the son of the architect of Lord Francis Bacon's villa at Verulam, and his success in life was due to Sir Anthony, who once saw a picture which he had drawn exposed in a shop-window. Seeking for the artist, he found him working in a poor garret, and took him thence, and recommended him to the King. After his kind friend's death, Dobson became Sergeant-Painter to the King, and won the curious title of "the English Tintoretto."

We may divide the works of Van Dyck into three periods. Those which were done in Italy, and for a few years after his return, have a rich and mellow tone, derived from Rubens and the Venetian masters, and may be referred to his first manner. The second manner included his best works in portraiture, especially those done during his earlier years in England, and combined brilliancy and solidity, delicacy and firmness, being formed by the addition of the silvery color popular among the Flemish painters to the deeper tones of the Venetians. The third manner was merely a perversion of the second, including the pictures executed during the last half decade of his life, under the pressure of too much haste.
CHAPTER VI.

One of Van Dyck’s most conspicuous traits was his prodigious artistic fecundity, which is still attested by the great numbers of pictures from his hand which are now scattered over Europe, and the hundreds of portraits which are treasured in the manorial halls of England. During the last decade of his life, he finished many scores of pictures every year; and although his work was so rapidly dispatched there are some critics who prefer these to his earlier paintings, finding therein, in spite of their meagreness, more of inspiration and masterly command. He combined lightness of touch with vigor of effect, aided by facile drawing and a great skill in the use of his materials. His pictures still maintain an increasing value, seldom changing hands, and then only for very
In his Royal Academy lectures, Barry prefers Van Dyck's design to that of Rubens, and praises his marvelous chiaro-scuro. He adds that "Van Dyck's pictures, particularly his portraits, were evidently painted \textit{at once}, with sometimes a little retouching; and they are not less remarkable for the truth, beauty, and freshness of the tints than for the masterly manner of their handling or execution." Gilpin says that "never painter had that happy art which Van Dyck possessed of turning earths and minerals into flesh and blood. Never painter had that happy art of composing a single figure with the chaste simplicity of nature, and without affectation of any kind."

"Van Dyck was the first painter who e'er put 'adies' dress into a careless romance," is the graphic phrase of quaint old Sanderson. He was a great admirer of brilliant colors and rich fabrics, and found a peculiar pleasure and a high degree of success in painting white and blue satins and red silks. Still, in making the portraits of ladies Van Dyck was less successful than with gentlemen, since he would not flatter them, wherefore he failed to win their good will,
and often retired under their reproaches. Fortunately most of his portraits are of men. Janson, of Cologne, was in London at the same time as Van Dyck, and painted many portraits, though with but medium skill. The two artists lived together in close friendship, and once, when the Antwerper called on Janson, he found him in deep grief. In answer to his friend’s questions, the latter said: “I am now painting the portrait of a lady whom I cannot satisfy, notwithstanding my utmost efforts. She always calls me a dauber, and her malevolence disgusts me with life.” “Is that all?” rejoined Van Dyck. “Such troubles should not affect you. That sort of thing has often happened to me, and I have always taken it patiently.”

At first Van Dyck’s portraits were carefully worked over and slowly executed, so that they combined strength, finish, and expression in a glorious unity. But when commissions pressed upon him on all sides, and the lavish expenditures of his household called ceaselessly for larger revenues, he began to work much more rapidly, and with less care and study. His manner of painting at this prolific period is best described in De Piles's "Cours de Peinture:"

"The famous Jabach, known to all amateurs of the fine arts, who was Van Dyck's friend, and had him paint his portrait three times, told me that one day, when he was speaking to this painter of the quickness with which he finished portraits, Van Dyck answered that in the beginning he had labored hard and taken great pains with his works, both for his reputation and to acquire the ability to do them quickly when his establishment should render it necessary. Here is his usual routine, as he described it to me: He appointed a day and hour to the person whom he was about to paint, and never worked more than one hour at a time on any one portrait, whether sketching or finishing; and when his clock warned him that the hour was ended he arose and bowed to the sitter, as if to say that that was enough for the day, and then agreed with him on another time for a sitting. After that his valet came in to clean his brushes and arrange a fresh palette, while he received another patron, for whom the next hour was reserved. He worked thus on many portraits during the same day, with an extraordinary rapidity. After having lightly sketched a portrait, he made the sitter place himself in the attitude which he had previously planned, and with gray paper and black and white crayons in a quarter of an hour he designed his attitude and garments, which he arranged in a stately manner and with exquisite taste. He then gave this drawing to skillful people, whom he kept at his house, to paint the draperies from the very garments worn by the sitter, which were sent to the studio by the patron. The pupils having copied the garments as well as they could, he passed lightly over their work, and added to it, in brief time, the art and intelligence which we admire in those parts. As to the hands, he kept persons of both sexes at his command, who served him as models therein."

To aid him in these great works by painting the drapery and backgrounds, Van Dyck had three skillful assistants and co-laborers. Jean de Reyn, who was born at Dunkirk, in 1610, and received his art-instruction in the master's studio at Antwerp, accompanied him to England, and remained there until the death of Van Dyck. He was "

teacher in art, was a very young man he painted the portrait of an aged dame who had sat to Van Dyck in her youth. She told him that during her visits to Van Dyck's gallery she noticed that all the pictures had a white and raw look, far different from the warm and mellow hue now apparent in them, and which time alone must have given. Other traditions of Van Dyck's practice were thus handed down in direct succession to Reynolds, and helped to mold his career as a portrait-painter.

Henry Stone was one of the best copyists of Van Dyck's paintings, and many of his transcripts are now regarded as originals by the Flemish master, so exactly has he reproduced the airs and expressions of the subjects. Stone spent thirty-seven years in Holland, France, and Italy, and won a fair renown, living on terms of intimacy with Bernini and other great artists.

Peter Lely came to England the very year in which Van Dyck died, and it is supposed that he studied under his direction, which he scrupulously obeyed. There is a manuscript in the British Museum, in Lely's handwriting, containing a hundred pages of notes taken from the conversations of his teacher, setting forth his maxims and principles. "How often hath my kind master tould mee," says he, "Bee bould, — and that will make thee a master." Walpole affirms that this teacher must have been Van Dyck, whose manner Lely followed as near as he was able, and many of whose pictures he purchased from the widowed Maria. He was knighted afterwards, and became a famous painter of women, although, says Walpole, "Lely's nymphs are far too wanton and magnificent to be taken for anything but maids of honor." And again, "Sir Peter Lely's women trail fringes and embroidery through meadows and purling streams." He was very successful after the Restoration, and painted the dreamy-eyed beauties and fluttering draperies of the court of Charles II. with delicacy and grace. He continued to draw inspiration from the pictures of Van Dyck, twenty-six of which were in his possession when he died, in 1681.

The court-painter owed much to the scientific skill of Sir Theodore Turquet de Mayerne, a French Huguenot of noble birth, who was physician successively to Henri IV., James I., Charles
I., and Charles II. He was the foremost chemist of the age, and discovered new ideas in the composition of pigments and the use of the mineral colors, which he freely imparted to both Rubens and Van Dyck. He also gave valuable assistance to John Petitot, his compatriot and fellow-exile, who was instructed carefully by Sir Anthony, and by him induced to abandon his trade of jeweler and become an artist. Petitot developed into the best enamel-painter that the world had ever seen, and lived a noble and conscientious life withal.

Eastlake has recorded the recipe which Sir Anthony used in making his varnish, in the twelfth chapter of the "Materials for a History of Oil-Painting." In the last chapter of the same work are numerous details as to colors and oils, brought out in conversations between Van Dyck and De Mayerne, and recorded by the latter. The master argued in favor of a fluid and colorless oil, and preferred linseed oil to that of poppy-seeds or nuts. For yellow he used orpiment, with ground glass to dry it; and for white tried bismuth, and admired Rubens's secretly prepared white, but was forced to be content with white lead. He experimented in priming with isinglass, which ruined his picture; in distemper-painting; and in using onion-juice to make colors adhere. The fine glazing with which he finished the hair and certain other parts of his portraits was carefully prepared by him from peach-stones, and had a delicate and tender brown hue. His flesh-tints were often laid in on a gray groundwork.

Van Dyck executed more than a score of etchings, which are distinguished for a certain apparent rudeness, under which is a delicate precision of line and nice discrimination, while they are also of the greatest value on account of their vivid life and inimitable expression. They are for the most part portraits of the intimate friends and associates of the artist, and include the Breughels, Franck, Momper, Van Noort, Pontius, Snellinx, and other prominent artists, together with several magnates of Antwerp. He also made etchings from the painting of ‘Titian and his Mistress’ (so called); from an old portrait of Erasmus of Rotterdam; and from the antique bust of Seneca, in the Villa Borghese, at Rome. A dozen or more etchings of classical and religious scenes are also attributed to Van Dyck. These works have been minutely described by Hookham Carpenter.

It is said that Van Dyck painted the beautiful initials and borders, representing the customs and productions of Nova Scotia, on the commission which Charles I. issued to the Earl of Stirling, as commander-in-chief of that Western domain.

In painting animals Sir Anthony had no small skill, as is attested by his pictures of three horses, in England; a gray charger, at Dulwich; a pair of fiery steeds, of classic forms, in the National Gallery; the horses of Achilles, in Farnborough’s collection; a noble gray horse, owned by Sir A. Hume; and the prancing chargers in his equestrian portraits. He was also skillful in representing dogs, and has introduced them frequently, and with great success, in his family groups, and other pictures. He owned a fine dog himself, of which he was very fond.

There are thirteen portraits of Van Dyck, by his own hand, still preserved. One of the most interesting of these is that done en grisaille, wherein the master appears side by side with Rubens, with Mercury and Minerva above them, and numerous allegorical figures. This was painted for the engraving which Paul Pontius made. In another picture the artist portrays himself as Paris, with a bright and vivacious young face. Another shows him in company with Sir Endymion Porter, who wears a white satin jacket. The Egerton collection had a fine equestrian portrait of Van Dyck, in which his favorite greyhound is also depicted. Other pictures indicate the musical tastes of the artist, showing him in one playing on a guitar, and in another singing. Dallaway prefers the portrait of Van Dyck in the Louvre to any other. This delineates a slender figure, light complexion, gray eyes, chestnut-brown hair, and red beard.

Van Dyck was a handsome man, with a bright and vivacious countenance, clear and intelligent eyes, and a profusion of curling blonde hair. His stature was short, but his carriage was graceful, and his manners were those of a prince. In the latter part of his life, exhausted by prodigalities, wounded in his sensitive pride by successive disappointments, and disturbed by unavailing regrets, he lost much of his personal beauty, and with it no small part of his vanity.
A Few Representative Portraits.—The King and Queen.—The Royal Princes.—The Great Nobles.

It seems truly as if the heroes and princes, the nobles and ladies, whom Van Dyck painted, were transfigured upon the canvas, and placed above the ordinary experiences of humanity. They are the born-to-the-purple men and women, possessed only of virtues and talents, assuming only the most noble and stately attitudes, and airs of quiet and natural reserve. The dignity of their manner is augmented by an ingenious artifice, whereby the usually sombre backgrounds are lighted mainly by laces, delicate satins, white and patrician hands, and the minutely finished features. The body seems to have been eliminated; and the organs of wit and intelligence are developed at the expense of those more material in their suggestions. The predominant expressions are delicately marked and quietly shadowed forth, with a refinement and simplicity under the rolling fire of the Puritan battalions. Whatever artifices of color and fabric could avail to heighten the dignity and nobility of his effects were used with magic skill by the patrician artist, as well as all possible accessories of architecture and curtains, and backgrounds of park landscapes, or brave battles on ship or shore. It is impossible to estimate how much of the romantic interest and sympathy with which the subsequent generations have regarded the cause of the Cavaliers may be due to the grace and stateliness with which Sir Anthony portrayed its chiefs and immortalized their features.

He had indeed a worthy subject for his pencil in the person of his royal patron. The elder Disraeli says: "It is singular that artists of genius have considered that the head of this monarch is the only portrait which they could venture to place before them as a model for the head of Christ, so peculiar is its mixture of majesty and sadness. Thus it happens that in looking on the portrait of Charles, with all its numerous associations, whether some behold 'the King in chains, and the Prince bound in fetters,' or others 'a man of sorrows acquainted with grief,' there is no portrait of any other sovereign which awakens such powerful emotions as does the head of Charles I."

Mrs. Jameson says that there still exist thirty-six portraits of Charles I. by Van Dyck. Several of these are in Windsor Castle, and others in various lordly houses of Great Britain. The picture of the King and Queen together, he with one hand on his sword and the other extended to take a laurel-wreath which Henrietta is extending to him, is at the Castle; and several groups are still preserved, in which the royal couple appear with their children.

The Queen, the beautiful young Henrietta Maria, daughter of Maria de Medicis and Henri IV. of France, "the rich-eyed darling of a monarch's breast," was painted twenty-five times by Van Dyck, and as many engravings were made, to show her features to the people of Great Britain. This "most lady-like of queens and of women" had at least seven full-length portraits painted, of which that at Windsor is one of the best, and shows her daintily arrayed in white satin and pearls, with a countenance whose symmetry does not conceal its dignity and thought. It is the same of which Waller wrote:—

“Could Nature then no private woman grace, Whom we might dare to love, with such a face?”

The fair sovereign appears in other pictures robed in orange silk, black silk, blue silk and gold lace, crimson silk and diamonds, sometimes holding a bunch of roses, sometimes a sprig of laurel, with the British crown on a table near her, and other surroundings of regal magnificence. When Charles fled from Whitehall, he left a note for Colonel Whalley, saying, with republican simplicity, “My wife’s picture, in blue satin, sitting in a chair, you must send to Mrs. Kirk.”

During the first year or two of his sojourn in England Van Dyck painted the great equestrian portrait of Charles I., in which that merry monarch is seen riding out from a lofty archway, attended by the Chevalier d’Epernon, his equerry. When the King’s property was sequestered, this picture was bought by Remigius Van Leemput, a Dutch artist, for two hundred pounds. He afterwards demanded fifteen hundred guineas for it, but it was recovered for the Crown by a legal process. The King gave a duplicate of this portrait to Sir John Byron of Newstead Abbey, which is now owned by Lady Warren, of Stapleford, Notts. Another was given to Earl Waldegrave, whose descendant was offered five hundred guineas for it by Sir Joshua Reynolds, but preferred to take the chances of an auction sale, where it was purchased for sixty-five guineas by the Earl of Warwick, in whose family it still remains. Sir Peter Lely made an excellent copy of this picture, which hangs in the hall of the Middle Temple. Lombart engraved a plate from Van Dyck's painting, which was afterwards most radically changed by the substitution of Cromwell's head for that of the King.

One of the latest portraits which Sir Anthony painted of his august master represents him in full armor, sitting on a roan charger, and attended by his equerry, Sir Thomas Morton. In the background is seen a combat of cavalry; perhaps a prophecy of Prince Rupert's cavaliers meeting the Roundhead horsemen. This picture was bought at Munich by John, Duke of Marlborough, in spite of his narrow parsimony, which constrained him, when he entered the tent of Prince Eugene to attend a midnight conference, to put out three of the four candles which stood on the Prince's table. The Marlborough collection also contains fine companion pictures of the King and Queen, and a full-length of the latter, in dark blue silk trimmed with ermine and pearls.

Most of the portraits which Van Dyck painted for the King and Queen were sent away as presents. Charles presented his own picture to Mr. Murray, one of the gentlemen of the household; to the Queen of Bohemia; to Baron Wharton; to the Prince Palatine; and others. The Queen's pictures were sent to the Queen of Bohemia; to Mr. Fielding; to Baron Wharton; and to the Count of Holland. Two other portraits of Henrietta Maria were sent to Bernini, the famous Roman sculptor, in order that by their aid he might make a bust of the royal lady. These were returned to England, and now adorn the Van-Dyck room in Windsor Castle. The portraits presented to the Wharton family were purchased by Sir Robert Walpole, and are now in the Hermitage Palace, at St. Petersburg.

Another picture showed King Charles's face in three different positions, and was sent out for the inspection of Bernini, in order that he might make a portrait bust therefrom. The King paid Bernini one thousand crowns for this work, which was destroyed or stolen when Whitehall Palace burned, in 1698. When the sculptor received the picture, he was instantly struck by the sorrowful expression ("Ecco! Il volto funesto") of the face, and prophesied the evil fate of its original. Van Dyck's painting remained in Bernini's family until 1796, when it was purchased and sent to England. In 1822 it was placed in the Van-Dyck room at Windsor Palace, having been acquired by the King for one thousand guineas. A similar bust of Queen Henrietta was ordered, but events occurred to prevent its delivery.

In 1637 the master painted a beautiful group of the five royal children, which King Charles esteemed so highly that he hung it in his breakfast-room at Whitehall. The main figure was Prince Charles, aged seven; and the others were the Princess Mary, the Duke of York, Elizabeth, and Anne. When the King was slain and his pictures were dispersed, this one disappeared, but afterwards came to light in the collection of the Earl of Portmore, from whom King George III. purchased it. Another group, now at Windsor, shows the King and Queen, with Arundel and other nobles, and the old palace of Greenwich in the background.

One of the sweetest of Van Dyck’s child-pictures was that representing Prince Charles in his seventh year, with his sister Mary and his brother James, Duke of York. Charles is in scarlet, Mary in white satin, and the little Duke in blue silk. This picture is in the Turin Gallery, with a duplicate at Wilton. Another group of the same children, taken a year or two later, is at Windsor Castle, with a duplicate in the Dresden Gallery. The figures are full-length, and two spaniels are introduced into the composition.

Sir Anthony painted several portraits of Prince Charles, who afterwards became the dissolute and careless King Charles II., and by his frivolity prepared the ruin of the Stuart family. In one of these pictures the boy, only eleven years old, is clad in armor, and holds a pistol in his hand. Another shows him with his hand on the head of a large dog; and in a third he is clad in buff, with red silk sleeves.

The fiery cavalier, Prince Rupert of the Rhine, was frequently portrayed by the court-painter. There are two pictures, in the Belvedere and the Louvre, wherein he is represented with his brother Charles Louis, arrayed like him in a black Spanish costume. Lords Craven, Warwick, and Pembroke own portraits of the Prince, after his twentieth year, clad in armor, with slashed satin sleeves and a gold sword-belt. His long and curly brown hair, which streamed over so many English battle-fields, falls on a rich lace collar. The artist also etched Rupert's portrait, with a crown in one hand and a sword in the other.

The splendid talents and melancholy fate of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, induced such a deep interest that Van Dyck repeated his portrait more times than that of any other British noble. One of the most admirable of these pictures is now at Petworth, and places before the spectator the noble Earl in the prime of life, with his strong features partly framed by curling hair and a brown beard, while his figure is covered with brilliant armor. This beautiful work of art has been engraved eight times. Another interesting picture shows his three children: Lord William, in his sixteenth year; Lady Anne, in white satin; and Lady Arabella. There are two pictures of Strafford and his secretary, Sir Philip Mainwaring, at Blenheim and in Lord Fitzwilliam's collection. The Earl is in black silk, and his companion is in red silk. Walpole regarded the portrait now owned by Lord Fitzwilliam as the finest work of Van Dyck, and said, "I can forgive him any insipid portraits of perhaps insipid people, when he showed himself capable of conceiving and transmitting the idea of the greatest man of the age." It is expressly stated that the artist and the noble were on intimate terms of friendship, and that Strafford was active in Sir Anthony's behalf.

The Earl of Pembroke was another liberal patron, and for him the artist painted the largest and most important of his English works,—a family piece, somewhat formal in arrangement, but with each figure graceful and elegant in its attitude and expression. It contains the Earl and Countess, with eleven members of their family, and occupies one end of the saloon at Wilton. Lord Pembroke intended to have Van Dyck paint a similar picture of the royal family, as a pendant to that of his own race, and he secured the King’s consent thereto, but the plan was never carried out. The artist received five hundred pounds for the so-called Wilton Family; and in later days the picture cleaners and restorers have seriously damaged this, his largest canvas. Numerous other portraits of the Pembroke family and their countesses were painted by the master, and are still preserved.

There is much difference of opinion as to the Wilton family picture, which some esteem as Van Dyck’s masterpiece, and Charles Rogers calls “the first and most magnificent historic portraiture in the world;” while others arraign it as stiff and disjointed, and Gilpin says that it is devoid of design, composition, and harmony, and glaring in color. Rogers adds that the episode depicted is the announcement by the Earl to his assembled family of the necessity of the departure of his son, Lord Herbert, to join the Tuscan army. The young soldier appears to receive the tidings with joyful ardor; while his bride, Lady Mary Villiers (who stands in the centre, robed in white satin), is filled with grief. But this incident deals only with deep emotions and facial expressions, and leaves the figures in repose. Probably Van Dyck purposely avoided such incidents as those portrayed in Titian’s and Reynolds’s great family pictures, in the belief that picturesqueness in this regard would be purchased by a loss of etiquette and dignity, in the destruction of the erect and stately postures of the aristocratic Pembroke. But the statuesque formality of the actual arrangement is devoid of human interest, and gives an appearance of reason to the arguments of those who maintain that Van Dyck could not paint historical pictures, or compose large groups successfully. Perhaps the manner of the composition was ordered by the Earl himself, who, indeed, must Algernon Percy, the tenth Earl of Northumberland, was one of Van Dyck’s most liberal patrons, and had him paint ‘The Crucifixion,’ with angels collecting in cups of gold the blood which flows from the Saviour’s wounds. The master also executed for him an extensive series of portraits, several of which were kept at Alnwick. Percy’s great-grand-daughter married Sir William Wyndham, who was afterwards created Earl of Egremont, and the collection of portraits was transferred to his castle of Petworth, where they still remain. One of them shows the Earl and his wife, the one in black silk and the other in blue silk, with their young daughter, clad in lustrous white satin. Another portrait of the Earl, in steel armor and yellow silk, and curly golden hair, is owned by the Earl of Essex.

James Stuart, Duke of Richmond and Lennox, Lord Steward, and Warden of the Cinque Ports, was portrayed several times, with his flowing flaxen hair, and the orders of knighthood glittering against his garments of black satin. Richmond’s father was cousin to James I.; and the royal blood of the Stuarts, flowing in his veins, moved him to follow the unfortunate Charles through his wars and wanderings. The artist also portrayed his two brothers, Lords John and Bernard Stuart, richly-clad flaxen-haired youths, who entered the royal army before they were of age, and were slain, the one at the battle of Alresford, the other at Chester.

When Buckingham was assassinated, his two sons were taken into the royal household, and educated with the princes. Here Van Dyck made their portraits, on one canvas, which is now at Windsor, and ranks as one of his most elegant and life-like works. The elder brother, George Villiers, became Duke of Buckingham and the favorite of Charles II.; the other, Lord Francis Villiers, was killed in the civil wars, when but nineteen years old, as thus reported by Clarendon: "The Lord Francis having his horse slain under him got to an oak-tree in the highway about two miles from Kingston, where he stood with his back against it defending himself, scorning to ask quarter, and they barbarously refusing to give it, till with nine wounds in his beautiful face and body he was slain."

Sir Anthony painted a noble portrait of Robert Bertie, Earl of Lindsey, whose godmother was Queen Elizabeth, while her favorites, the two Roberts, the Earls of Essex and of Leicester, were his sponsors. He was now a veteran of the Flemish and West-Indian wars, and the time was drawing near when he should be slain, while commanding the royal army at Edgehill. The martial noble is arrayed in polished armor, over which falls a broad lace collar and a silken sash, and presents the curious phenomenon of a bald head. His son and successor, Montague Bertie, was also portrayed by Van Dyck, wearing a cuirass over a buff jacket, with slashed sleeves, and a rich gold belt upholding his sword. Montague was a valiant soldier, and commanded the Life Guards in the battles against the Parliament troops, by whom he was often wounded and imprisoned.

Another noble soldier whom Van Dyck portrayed in armor was Stanley, Earl of Derby, who had received no favors nor attentions from the King, and yet, moved by a fine sense of loyalty, raised sixty thousand men in Lancashire to guard the royal standard. While his wife, a Peeress of France, defended the family mansion until six thousand of the Parliament troops were lost before it, Derby held the Isle of Man, and for seven years kept it loyal to the King. Afterwards he received six wounds, at Wigan; and was captured and executed by the Puritans. Sir Anthony also portrayed his heroic Countess, the daughter of the Duke of Thouars, a noble-looking woman, arrayed in white satin, with triple rows of pearls around the low corsage. Another beautiful picture exhibits the Earl and Countess and their daughter, with a wide landscape and marine expanse in the background.

The Marquis of Hertford was painted when about sixty years old, in brilliant armor, standing in a tent. This was the faithful noble who afterwards led the royal army in the West, and became the King's closest companion and counsellor. Another of the royal partisans whom Sir Anthony painted was the Marquis of Worcester, whose curiously-shaped face rises above the glittering curves of heavy armor. Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, was another of Sir Anthony’s patrons, who afterwards stood close to the Stuart throne, and was bruised by its fall. He was the son of that Earl who was Shakespeare’s protector. Sir Anthony painted four portraits of Rachel de Rouvigny, Southampton’s first wife, and one of Elizabeth, his second wife.

Another beautiful full-length portrait was that of Edward Sackville, Earl of Dorset, whose long curls fall on a lace collar, while his scarlet jacket, with slashed sleeves, is partly covered by a cuirass. This was the handsome and witty nobleman who was so chagrined and shocked at the decapitation of his King, that he made and kept a vow never to leave his house again. The artist also made a portrait of the Countess of Dorset (born Curzon).

The Earl of Caernarvon was portrayed in a yellow satin vest and copious laces; and his Countess, one of Pembroke’s daughters, is commemorated in a beautiful half-length. The noble pair also appear in the Wilton Family; and again in a single picture, at Longleat. Caernarvon was of the King’s best soldiers, and was slain in the fatal battle of Newbury.
Lord Hopton, afterwards the daring cavalry chief and victorious commander of the King's armies in Cornwall, was portrayed by Sir Anthony, in silk, lace, and orders; and his wife was delineated by the same skillful brush. William Villiers, Viscount Grandison, appears in another picture, arrayed in a scarlet vest embroidered with gold, a broad lace frill, and a red mantle. Villiers was one of the King's generals, and was slain while bravely charging at the siege of Bristol. Another patron, who is represented in a semi-Oriental shooting-costume, was the Earl of Denbigh, sometime an Admiral of the fleet, and then Ambassador to Persia, who returned to join the royal army, and met death in the assault on Birmingham. Another picture shows the round face and waving locks of Lord Falkland, that noble scholar and profound writer who was slain while in the royal ranks at Newbury. In the same rich blazonry of art appear the vivacious features of George Gordon, Marquis of Huntly, with long curly locks and a pointed beard, and a rich costume wherein the grim cuirass is nearly obscured by laces and slashed sleeves, and a blue sash covered with fleurs-de-lis. Huntly fought for Charles in Scotland, and was beheaded by the Covenanters, at the Edinburgh market-cross.

The Duke of Hamilton was a Scottish noble of the blood-royal, of whom Van Dyck made several portraits, showing him in the shining armor in which he had fought for the Reformation, in the Thirty Years' War, and for King Charles during the civil war. But even those garments of polished steel could not save his neck from the axe of the Parliament's headsman. Another armor-clad Scottish chieftain whom Sir Anthony depicted, with a bright and noble face, was the Marquis of Montrose, the dauntless and ill-fated commander of the King's forces in the North.

The crafty Earl of Warwick, afterwards one of the rebel peers, and Lord High Admiral of England, was portrayed in a suit of splendid armor, over which falls a prodigious linen collar. The Countess of Warwick was also painted by Sir Anthony.

The Earl of Bedford was another of the popular leaders who enlisted Van Dyck's brush, in

The two fair daughters of Henry Percy, Dorothy and Lucy, were often successfully painted by the master. The first-named became Countess of Leicester, and was celebrated for her beauty and sweetness, which appear in the portrait in her benign and placid features. Lucy, Countess of Carlisle, was a haughty and eccentric woman, who became famous as a politician and courtier. Her portrait was painted four times, in all the bravery of figured and orange silks, and with flowers adorning her auburn hair.

Anne Carr, the Countess of Bedford, was portrayed in a robe of crimson silk, with her long golden hair falling in ringlets on her neck. Lady Bedford was one of the leading beauties of the British Court, and besides the preceding picture (now at the Louvre) she was delineated at least five times,—in white satin, with an Italian greyhound at her feet, now at Woburn Abbey; in red silk, with crossed hands, famous for their beauty, at Althorp; in bright blue silk, drawing on her gloves, at Petworth; and others. The picture at Petworth is known as 'The Blue Lady,' and breathes out an air of beauty, innocence, and intelligence. Says Leslie: "She looks perfectly happy, and Van Dyck must have been perfectly happy when he painted her; for she makes you perfectly happy to look at her."

One of the most pleasing of Sir Anthony's English portraits was that of his great contemporary, Inigo Jones, the royal architect successively of Denmark, Scotland, and England, of whom Walpole wrote: "England adopted Holbein and Van Dyck, she borrowed Rubens, she produced Inigo Jones." The architect of Whitehall Palace is represented as about sixty years old, with gray beard and mustache, and curly gray locks escaping from beneath his velvet cap and falling over his noble forehead. The portrait has been engraved five times.

Sir Anthony seems to have avoided the Puritan and popular leaders with scrupulous care, and to have given all his attention to the nobles and courtiers. The Hampdens, Pyms, and Cromwells never visited his studio, and probably would have met with scant courtesy if they had.

In equal manner the artist seems to have separated from the untitled literati of his time, none of whom was honored by his pencil. Ben Jonson was the poet-laureate of this period, the second in succession from Spenser, and long time a contemporary and would-be rival of Shakespeare, but now an unwieldy old man, devoted to wine and indolence. His face and form must have been familiar to Van Dyck, since London was then smaller than Boston now is; but neither artist nor poet recorded their impressions of each other. Chapman was also still alive, and Massinger, and Ford, the Fletchers, Aytoun, and Drummond of Hawthornden, quaint old Quarles, and gentle George Herbert. The court poets were Sir John Suckling and Thomas Carew, both of whom Van Dyck portrayed. Milton was still a young man, at college and on the Continent, and the future Lord Clarendon was a junior barrister of the Middle Temple. What can we say, in a single line, of the four strange characters then contemporary, Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Henry Wotton, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and Lord Falkland?

The Puritan and Anglican divines were pounding each other mercilessly, and these were the days of Bishop Hall, Dr. Sibbes, the Hebraist Lightfoot, and Archbishop Usher. Furthermore, Burton then lived, and enjoyed the fame arising from his "Anatomy of Melancholy;" and Selden, the superb scholar, was combating the Church.

Edmund Waller, indeed, wrote a poem to Van Dyck, beginning "Rare artisan;" and Lord Halifax dedicated another poem to his portrait of the Countess of Sunderland. Abraham Cowley wrote an elegy after his death, a part of which is quoted at the end of this volume.
CHAPTER VIII

Van Dyck painted little besides portraits while he was in England, since his success in this line, and the large profits arising therefrom, made him neglect his talents as a historical painter. Most of the compositions which he executed were included in Bellori's list, and included several devotional pictures for Sir Kenelm Digby, among which were the Dead Christ, with Joseph and Nicodemus; St. John the Baptist; the Magdalen in Ecstasy; Judith and the head of Holofernes; and the Dying Saviour. The latter was presented by Sir Kenelm to the Princess de Guemenè, in Paris. Among the pictures painted for the King were Apollo and the Muses, the Bacchanals, Apollo flaying Marsyas, and Venus and Adonis; and the Queen received from Van Dyck a beautiful composition of the Holy Family. He portrayed the Countess of Portland and the Duchess of Aubigny in the garb of nymphs; and another lady was represented as Venus, looking at herself in a mirror which was held by a negro. The Duchess of Richmond, daughter of the Duke of Buckingham, was portrayed as Venus, attended by the infant son of the Duke of Hamilton, quite nude, and bearing the attributes of Cupid. Once more she was represented as St. Agnes, in the portrait now at Windsor, reclining on a bank, in an elegant satin dress, and with a lamb and a palm-branch as accessories. Several other pictures of this lovely peeress, by Van Dyck's hand, are now at Wilton, Blenheim, and other palaces.

The pages of ancient history and tradition were illuminated by the master's pictures of the blind Belisarius, begging in the track of the army which he had so often led to victory; the dreamy Rinaldo, with his head in Armida's lap, around whom Cupids are at play; the discovery of Achilles, masquerading in skirts among the women of the court of Lycomedes; Venus, bowing in broken-hearted sorrow over the slain Adonis, or taking off the armor from ruddy Mars; Daedalus teaching his son to fly, in several pictures; Romulus and Remus and the Roman wolf; Dido and Æneas, surrounded by Cupids; Diana bending over the sleeping Endymion; and numerous satyrs and nymphs, bacchanals and Cupids.

Sir Anthony at last seems to have awakened to the belief that he should once more assert his power in great historical paintings, and leave in England a worthy monument of his highest talents. He found the opportunity in the banqueting room of Whitehall Palace, not only to exhibit his power in its best estate, but also to enter into a direct competition with his old master. Rubens had frescoed the ceiling of this stately hall with a series of rich and brilliant pictures; and Van Dyck proposed to adorn the lateral walls with a group of paintings representing the history of the Order of the Garter. Sir Kenelm Digby laid the matter before the King, who was greatly pleased with the idea, and desired that sketches of the pictures might be prepared for his inspection. One of these, 'The Procession of the Knights

But the great revenues arising from his painting were not enough for the knightly artist, whose household expenses were rapidly increasing, while he was already confined to the studio almost continually. He therefore sought to augment his fortunes by a sudden and inexhaustible method, and indulged himself in the vain hope of discovering the means of chemically transmuting the base metals into gold. When Jan Lievens visited London, he found him bent over a crucible, feeble and emaciated, but with the glare of cupidity in his eyes. His wealth was rapidly consumed in these experiments, or drawn away by quack necromancers. When Rubens was in London, he was approached by one of these alchemists, who offered him vast profits for a slender outlay, but the acute artist-diplomat showed him his studio, and said: “You come too late, my good fellow; it is a long time since I have discovered the philosopher’s stone. My palette and brushes are worth far more than your secret.” Would that Rubens’s pupil had been as wise as his master!

Thus the demon of cupidity began to take possession of the noble artist; howbeit it was not a desire for miserly acquisition, but rather a wish to increase his already princely revenues, that thus he might augment the luxury and generosity of his establishment. When he painted the hands of Henrietta of France with far more care than he had bestowed on her face, and she demanded why he thus labored over an unimportant part, he replied: "Because I expect to receive from these admirable hands a generous recompense, worthy of their perfection!" The artist was madly in love with Lady Stanhope, and overwhelmed her with protestations during all the time he was painting her portrait, but after that picture was done, he disputed with her about its price, and threatened to sell it to a less parsimonious purchaser, unless she paid the sum which he demanded.

The anxieties of his position, the luxuries of gallantry, and the poisonous vapors of the alembics combined to undermine Van Dyck's constitution, and made fearful inroads on a system already weakened by excessive labors in the studio. There is a sad change between the fresh, rosy, hopeful, and smiling portrait of himself while a youth (now at Florence), and the portrait painted many years later, and now at the Louvre, in which he appears weary and ennuye, with dull eyes, meagre cheeks, thin and lustreless hair, and a wrinkled brow. As Michielis says, it shows "the coquettish deshabille of a man of the world, after a voluptuous night," while the golden vapor which surrounds the head is as a poetic twilight about the descending sun of the master.

The King was troubled at the dissipated life and the intemperate excesses of his artist, and at last resolved to sober him, and induce him to take a worthy position in the Court, by uniting him in matrimony with a family of rank. The lady whom Charles selected as a reforming agent was Maria Ruthven, a beautiful Scotch girl, who had been brought up in the household of Queen Henrietta Maria, and held an honorary position near her person. Patrick Ruthven, her father, was an eminent physician, the son of the Earl of Gowrie, and had been imprisoned in the Tower for connexion with the famous Gowrie conspiracy. The Duchess of Montrose and Lennox and the.
Countess of Athol were Maria Ruthven's aunts, but she had no property of her own, since the Gowrie estates had been confiscated by the Government. It has been suggested that the King sought a double result in this marriage,—first, to gratify the pride of his cavalier-artist, and next to humble the hostile Ruthven-Gowrie clan by mingling their blood with that of a hand-worker and a foreigner.

Some writers have imagined that Sir Anthony was not pleased with this arrangement, and had but scant comfort with his wife. But nothing is known on this subject, nor are there any circumstances which indicate that the artist's married life was otherwise than pleasant. About the only contemporary testimony extant is Cowley's elegy, in which the poet warmly expatiates on the bliss which attended the union, and the sweetness of the bride. A handsome portrait of Maria Ruthven is in the Munich Gallery, and has been engraved five times. The portraits of Lord and Lady Ruthven are also preserved at Munich.

In September, 1640, Van Dyck returned to Flanders, taking his wife with him. He was well received at Antwerp, and enjoyed for a brief season the contemplation of the scenes dear to his childhood. But when tidings came from Paris that Louis XIII. intended to have the great gallery of the Louvre adorned with paintings, he hastened westward to the French capital, in the hope of obtaining the contract. Already, however, the King had summoned Nicholas Poussin from Rome, and confided the new decorations to him; and Simon Vouet and his fellow-conspirators had begun the machinations which resulted in the abandonment of the plan by that artist. Van Dyck abode in Paris for two months, and then returned to London. During his sojourn in the French capital, Sir Anthony painted several pictures, among which was a portrait of Anne of Austria.

It is probable that the master made several voyages to Antwerp during his English sojourn, since he was deeply attached to his native city, and the journey thither was not a long one. Moreover, he had a large property there, which must have required occasional attention. In 1634 he was chosen Dean of the Confraternity of St. Luke, at Antwerp, and a great feast was celebrated in honor of the event. Six years later, when he took his bride to the Flemish city, the artists and the members of the Academy of Painting received the distinguished couple with brilliant festivities.

The political skies of England, long flecked with ominous clouds, were now overcast with a sombre pall of thick darkness. During Van Dyck’s absence, the throne itself was menaced; and on his return he found a kingdom everywhere armed against itself. The Long Parliament was asserting the rights of the English people, as against any prerogatives whatever, and even Lord Strafford himself was summoned before its tribunal. In March, 1641, the royal family was dispersed, Charles and his sons seeking refuge at York, while the Queen betook herself to France. In May the noble Earl of Strafford was executed, by order of the Long Parliament, a victim of popular clamor and blind rage.

The arts, which the Stuart princes had so generously nurtured, fell into neglect and dishonor as soon as those princes were driven into extreme danger. Van Dyck saw the rapid decline in his circumstances, and the attendant disasters which were threatening the cause of art, and was keenly affected by the ruin of the King who had been so kind to him. He felt a deep chagrin at his successive failures in the attempted works at Whitehall and the Louvre, his greatest and most promising projects, whose results were most galling to his sensitive temperament. These mental troubles struck him when his physical system was low and exhausted by prolonged labors, and soon culminated in a malady under which he sank rapidly. The disease was probably in some way connected with the gout, from which he had suffered seriously of late years. The medical treatment certainly left nothing to be desired on the score of thoroughness and energy, since at one time, in order to restore warmth to the patient's cold limbs, the doctors had a cow slain and opened, and placed the sick man inside of the warm carcass.

He continued working in his studio until within a few days of his death, the last picture on the easel being a full-length and life-size composition representing Cupid and Psyche.

made to the executors, to the servants of the Van-Dyck household, and to the poor of the parishes of St. Paul and St. Anne, Blackfriars. The executors were Madame Maria Van Dyck, Aurelius de Meghem, and Catherine Cowley (the poet’s sister), the latter of whom was appointed guardian of the new-born daughter until she reached her eighteenth year.

The civil wars in England and the hostilities with Holland rendered it impossible to take out a probate of the will until 1663, when the heirs held a meeting to devise measures to realize their claims. But as late as 1703 the estate had not been fully settled.

The King soon returned from the North, where he had been treating with the victorious Scottish insurgents on the one hand, and his hostile Parliament on the other. Embarrassed though he was by a thousand menacing events, the generous sovereign felt the deepest sorrow at the forlorn condition of his protégé, and offered the doctor three hundred pounds if he would save the life of Sir Anthony. But the highest medical science of the day failed to arrest the progress of the destroying disease, and on the 9th of December, 1641, the great Flemish artist expired, while yet in the prime of his life. Two days later, he was buried, on the north side of the choir of the old Cathedral of St. Paul, near the tomb of the princely John of Gaunt. It is traditionally reported that his funeral was a splendid one, attended by many nobles and artists. When St. Paul's was destroyed by fire, Sir Anthony's remains were probably scattered, and at the time of the burial of Benjamin West, the American artist, in the crypts of the new St. Paul's, his coffin-plate was turned up.

Van Dyck's fair Scottish wife did not care to retain her illustrious name at the expense of a solitary life, and afterwards married a Welsh knight, Sir Richard Pryse, of Gogerddan. The master's daughter, Justiniana, married Sir John Stepney, a baronet of Pembroke-shire, and had a son and two daughters, the latter of whom became abbesses of Flemish nunneries. Her second marriage was with Martin de Carbonell, Esq. Shortly after the Restoration, King Charles II. granted her a pension of two hundred pounds, but its irregular payment called forth several petitions from her, in which she reminded the sovereign that these moneys were fairly due, since his father had owed her father great sums, which were never paid. After 1670 the pension was duly delivered every quarter, and Van Dyck's daughter was set free from want.

"Let's all our solemn grief in silence keep.
Like some sad picture which he made to weep,
Or those who saw't; for none his works could view
Unmov'd with the same passions which he drew.
His pieces so with their live objects strive,
That both or pictures seem, or both alive.
Nature herself, amaz'd, does doubting stand,
Which is her own and which the painter's hand;
And does attempt the like with less success,
When her own work in twins she would express.
His all-resembling pencil did out-pass
The mimic imagery of looking-glass.
Nor was his life less perfect than his art,
Nor was his hand less erring than his heart.
There was no false or fading colour there,
The figures sweet and well-proportioned were."

From Cowley's "Elegy on Sir Anthony Van Dyck."
